P.S.: Where Did All This Information Come From 221

Introduction

Welcome, my dear friend.

What you're holding in your hands is not just a book in the ordinary sense of the word.

This book is about marketing. Marketing for entrepreneurs.

The first and primary goal of this book is to show that business owners simply must understand the marketing of their own business. And they should never — never, ever — hand off responsibility for promotion and revenue to marketers. Whether they're in-house staff or freelancers.

Because the owner knows far more about their business and their product than anyone else. And no marketer is as invested in the success of the marketing as the owner themselves.

The second goal of this book is to give you a clear, universal system for building marketing in your business. This book doesn't cover tricks or tactics like "how to film a Story" or "step-by-step guide to setting up social media ads."

This book is made up entirely of fundamental strategies that worked a hundred years ago, work today, and will work a hundred years from now. That is, of course, assuming human psychology doesn't change in the next century. But as practice shows, it hasn't changed once in two thousand years. So the chances of it changing anytime soon are pretty much zero.

If you understand these core principles, you'll be able to easily manage the process of attracting clients who have real money to spend.

You can do it yourself, or you can bring in marketers and manage their work consciously — not just waiting around for magic to happen. You'll be able to set them realistic goals. And honestly, they'll thank you for it.

Or you can hand off a chunk of the routine work to artificial intelligence. Saving you a massive amount of time and money in the process. And the good news is, AI already delivers excellent results in analytics and data collection.

How do you do that the right way?

Well, that's the third goal of this book — to help you offload up to 80% of the routine to AI.

In fact, this book turned out to be both a training guide for entrepreneurs and a prompt guide. Because it includes all the necessary tools for working with AI at practically every step. And honestly, you can even load the entire book into AI and ask it to build a marketing strategy for your business based on the content.

That's where the name comes from: No-Marketer Marketing™. The WTF System: Without The Friction — marketing without friction.

With this name, I wanted to communicate that you can do marketing without marketers — consciously, without unnecessary steps.

I'm not against hiring marketers. I'm against handing them the responsibility for your business's success. Because I deeply believe that the main purpose of a business is to generate profit for its owner. And if the owner hands off that responsibility to others... the chances of success become catastrophically slim.

In this book, you'll find out how to take that success into your own hands. By "control," I don't mean micromanagement — I mean actively directing the process.

Moving on.

So that we can be on the same page, let's start by agreeing on what I mean by "marketing."

Let me begin with definitions from world-class copywriters and marketers — the ones I find most meaningful and that guide my own work.

Claude Hopkins: “The only purpose of advertising is to make sales.”

In other words, marketing isn’t about brand awareness or likes — it’s about the measurable result of bringing money in.

Dan Kennedy: “Marketing is the ability to talk to your client about their world in a way that makes them see your product as the solution to their problems.”

In other words, marketing always starts with the client: their pains and desires, not the product. We don’t promote a product — we show how our product helps the client solve their challenges.

Eugene Schwartz: “Marketing is the art of directing an already existing desire toward your product.”

In other words, marketing doesn’t create desire — it identifies existing desires and channels them toward the product. The biggest mistake a marketer can make is thinking they can manufacture demand.

Jay Abraham: “Marketing is educating the market on how to solve their own problems using your product.”

In other words, marketing is a process of teaching the market how to solve its challenges using your product or service.

Gary Halbert: “Marketing is precisely hitting the client’s desires and creating a product that satisfies those desires.”

In other words, marketing doesn’t start with creativity or an offer — it starts with understanding what people truly want.

John Carlton: “Marketing is continuing the client’s internal dialogue, where you offer the logical next step.”

In other words, marketing doesn’t “manipulate” — it “listens in” and plugs into the client’s current thoughts.

David Ogilvy: “Marketing is smart, respectful communication whose ultimate goal is sales.”

In other words, marketing is a respectful conversation — one whose goal is a sale, not “creativity for creativity’s sake.”

From everything above, we can conclude:

Marketing is first and foremost about sales. It’s a long-term, systematic effort that begins with analyzing the market and uncovering clients’ true desires.

The job of marketing is to create products and services that best fulfill those desires, and to teach clients how to solve their challenges with those offerings.

If this definition resonates with you, and you agree that taking charge of your marketing is the direct responsibility of the business owner — then this book will absolutely be useful to you and your business.

With deep respect for you and your work,

Alex Key

Prologue: Three Waves That Are Changing the Rules of the Game

Before we dive into the main content, I want to explain what's actually happening in the world right now — and why this is a fantastic opportunity to accelerate fast and ride your own wave of success.

Wave 1. The Computer vs. the Desktop Adding Machine

Picture this.

1979. Somewhere in Ohio, a small auto parts store is doing just fine.

Working away in that store is an accountant named Sara. Sara took great pride in her efficiency and the speed at which she got things done.

She spent entire days clicking away at a desktop adding machine — one of those bulky electromechanical calculators with ten keys and a constantly buzzing paper tape. Ten hours of monotonous "whirr-whirr-whirr" just to calculate taxes to the cent and write the total in a thick ledger.

Right next door, a young guy who'd just graduated from college opened a stationery store. He didn't hire an accountant — instead, he got a personal computer with VisiCalc.

He'd type in his numbers, press one key — and his quarterly profit was ready in a minute.

Sara sometimes came to buy carbon paper for her machine and would just shrug: "You can't trust money to that weird box with wires. People calculate more accurately."

But those “boxes” kept getting cheaper and the software kept getting more user-friendly, and by the mid-80s, a business without a PC looked about as strange as typing an email on a typewriter. Those who never learned the =A1+A2 formula disappeared along with the smell of that carbon paper.

The lesson of the first wave: When technology takes over mechanical routine, raw “finger speed” loses its value.

Wave 2. The Internet vs. the Yellow Pages

1997. Still in Ohio.

“Joe & Sons” Auto Repair ran on a proven formula: every August, Joe Sr. shelled out around $800 for a spread in the new Yellow Pages. That thick yellow book sat in almost every office and every home. Which meant the phone would ring and new clients would walk in.

“People are used to it — something breaks, they grab the directory, and there’s my ad,” Joe tells himself as he signs another check to the publisher.

A quarter later, his revenue started dropping. Turned out that “this confusing internet” now had a site called FixItNow.com, offering visitors the chance to submit a request and immediately receive a price quote by email — along with a $10 discount coupon.

But Joe couldn’t accept this as reality and just waved his hand: “Who’s going to look for a repairman on the internet anyway?”

The answer came fast. Within five years, FixItNow had grown into a national franchise chain, and the last Yellow Pages edition was being used as a coffee coaster. Paper lost to the speed of a click.

The lesson of the second wave: The internet didn’t win on price — it won on speed and convenience. Clients go to whoever removed the friction between “something needs fixing” and “a repair guy is on the way.”

Wave 3. Artificial Intelligence vs. the “$100K Marketing Expert”

Third picture.

2025. Our hero this time lives in Chicago. His name is Dennis. Dennis owns three coffee shops.

Dennis’s reality is harsh. The world is drowning in content, clicks are getting more expensive, and a “certified social media ninja” wants $7,000 a month in salary plus another $5,000 for ads — for “warming up and going viral.”

While Dennis is calculating whether he should take out a loan for all of this, his competitor Max isn’t stressed in the slightest. His reality is downright beautiful.

In the morning, Max opens ChatGPT or Claude and types a simple prompt:

“Give me 15 ideas for a promotional campaign for tonight” → “Write three subject line options for a 2-for-1 coupon email” → “Come up with a Reels idea” → “Write ad copy for Facebook.”

And even with a basic prompt like that, he gets a perfectly usable result.

An hour later, he launches a social media ad for $100 and by that evening, he’s seeing the first wave of visitors.

AI did all the grunt work — both his own and what a marketer would have done — while Max runs the process and counts the profit.

AI frees Max from routine and speeds up every business process by a factor of hundreds.

Just like Excel simplified and accelerated the work of accountants by hundreds — if not thousands — of times.

Just as Excel took over all the routine work of the calculator and its operator Sara… AI does the same with grunt work like generating ideas or writing copy, letting entrepreneurs focus on strategy and results.

For entrepreneurs, this is a chance to take marketing into their own hands — without depending on “ten-thousand-dollar specialists” — and achieve more with less, in less time.

And that’s the lesson of the third wave: If technology can handle 80% of the routine, what’s valued is the person who owns the remaining 20%: the idea, the decision, the accountability for results.

New Technologies: Where the Agile and Fast Win, Not Just the Strong

Why did I tell you these three (almost) made-up stories?

To show that technology has always rewritten the rules, wiping out routine and empowering those who adapt quickly.

In the first technological wave I described, computers wiped out the value of manual arithmetic, shifting the focus to data analysis and strategic decisions.

In the second, the internet (as the logical continuation of computerization) eliminated distance and slow intermediary chains, giving the edge to those who delivered speed and convenience to the client.

And right now, you and I are living through the third wave of this technological tsunami — artificial intelligence. It’s sweeping away the barriers of routine, leaving value in the hands of those who think and act systematically.

And it’s precisely this artificial intelligence that can help you as an entrepreneur close out the majority of your marketing and promotional questions and tasks. And not just those, either.

If you ride this wave right now — systematic work with AI will eliminate 80% of the friction, and hand you back control over your bottom line.

Dismiss the technology as a passing fad, and you’ll end up in a museum of history — right next to mechanical abacuses and the Yellow Pages.

In this book, we’ll break down exactly how to ride that third wave.

What Small Business Faces in 2025 and What Comes Next

(One more cold shower before we turn up the heat.)

1. Attention Inflation

Every day, people see thousands of ads. They decide in a second or two whether to keep scrolling or stop. You need to capture their attention in that moment, hold it, and redirect it to you, your business, and your offer.

What's next: There will be even more content, and social media algorithms will get even more ruthless. Without paid promotion, your posts will be seen by less than 2% of your followers. Everything will cost money. And more every month.

What to do: Build your own subscriber base, one you can communicate with whenever you want and as much as you want.

2. Rising Click Costs and Platform Volatility

The average cost per click on platforms like Google and Facebook keeps climbing year after year, in almost every niche. And it'll keep rising — because more and more advertisers are flooding the platforms and competing for buyers' attention.

What's next: Any new privacy policy (and there will be more of them) = an instant spike in CPM/CPC. The platform is playing monopoly; you're playing Russian roulette.

What to do: Build your marketing around building your own base of interested and loyal clients and prospects first — not around the idea of selling them cold right off the bat.

3. The "AI Arms Race"

Chatbots are writing posts, Midjourney is generating visuals, and there are now more "magic button" services than there are coffee shops in Manhattan. But without strategy, this is just automated ad budget burning.

What's next: The barrier to entry for content creation will drop even further, while the bar for quality and trust will rise. "Done in a couple of clicks" won't impress anyone anymore. What will impress people is the right idea applied in the right context — or your personal brand.

What to do: Build a business around yourself. Make yourself interesting to your audience, and learn how to craft a Big Marketing Idea.

4. Shortage of Skilled Talent

Good people are hard to find. A good specialist is either expensive or freelancing across multiple projects. Retaining them means competing with Big Tech benefits.

What's next: Labor costs will keep rising, but not necessarily alongside productivity. Small businesses will have to either "grow in-house" or automate. Spoiler: both are done by the owner — not the "resume collector."

What to do: Make marketing your core function and optimize it with AI.

5. Distrust and the Authenticity Litmus Test

After the wave of information overload, people trust recommendations from friends more than celebrity endorsements. Many buyers only make a purchase after a recommendation from someone they know.

What's next: Brands will need to speak with a human voice, showing the "behind the scenes" of their professional life and business.

What to do: Become "that trusted friend" who clients rely on — using your personal brand and daily touchpoints with your client and prospect base.

6. Blockbuster Offers

The classic "10% off until Friday" promo no longer works, for many reasons. After seeing so many of these offers, clients develop a defense mechanism: banner blindness. People stop noticing anything their brain has already tagged as advertising. It's a natural survival response. Otherwise, you'd go insane — or spiral into deep depression — from the sheer volume of ads surrounding you.

What's next: The time between first contact and purchase will keep stretching out. Without a "wow" hook, people may never take that first step.

What to do: Create a soft offer — a proposition that solves the main problem, has minimal barriers to entry, and gives a compelling reason to act right now.

Where Does This Lead Us

- Attention becomes currency. The cost of attention goes up every single day. So the winner is whoever has their own subscriber base — not just ad campaigns.
- Selling cold becomes Russian roulette. As CPC rises, every miss hits the wallet harder. First, capture attention. Then build loyalty: turn casual viewers into devoted fans instead of chasing a quick sale.
- AI equalizes tools, but not ideas. Anyone can hit "generate," but crafting a Big Idea and integrating it into the customer journey is an art. Build your business around yourself: your personal brand makes you interesting, and AI becomes your trusted creative assistant.
- Expensive specialists stop paying off. If the owner doesn't understand the mechanics of marketing, no one will save their profits or protect them from losses. But if they do understand — they automate 80% with AI tools, stay in the black, and grow while others struggle.
- Trust decides the outcome of the deal. The louder the market gets, the more a brand's human voice matters. The winner is whoever is already "that person who gives great advice on what to choose" for their subscribers.

- A strong offer shortens the drawn-out path to money. Without a “wow” hook, a client will stall at the starting line. But a soft offer — one that solves the main problem with a low barrier to entry and a solid reason to act now — turns interest into action faster. It minimizes banner blindness, builds loyalty, and invites repeat purchases.

That’s precisely why the classic formula of “hire a marketer, give them a budget, wait for the report” is today destroying small businesses faster than having no marketing at all.

There’s been more friction and less results.

In the rest of this book, we’ll break down how to cut out the noise, keep the 20% of actions that actually work, and make them deliver 80% of the results.

CHAPTER 1

The 4 Stages of WTF Marketing

I want to start this chapter with a picture.

Picture this.

A business owner walks into a crowded networking event. Two hundred people. Every one of them came with their own agenda. Not a single one of them has ever heard of this business.

The owner climbs up on a table and starts loudly proclaiming — so that everyone can hear — the following:

“Ladies and gentlemen, allow me to introduce myself. Here’s my license. Here are my certificates. Here are my best reviews and my price list. I’ve been in business for ten years, and I’m ready to sign a contract with any one of you right now. Line up, whoever’s interested.”

How many people would actually get in line?

Maybe one or two. You’d definitely find them — but where’s the guarantee they’d make great long-term clients? That they’d stay with you through both the good times and the bad?

The good times — sure, they’d probably be in. But the rough patches? Probably not.

This is a bit of a joke scenario — not exactly a real-life situation. Things don’t usually go down like that.

But something very similar happens all the time. In business.

Businesses climb up on the table and start waving around their discounts, listing all their features and advantages.

These businesses find clients — but they're one-time clients. Here today, gone tomorrow.

They show up and disappear just as fast. Don't count on long-term relationships.

But it's precisely long-term relationships that build the strongest and most successful companies.

With all of this as a preamble, I want to drive home one simple point.

You don't propose on a first date. If you want to spend your life with someone, you build that relationship step by step — an introduction, a few conversations, time together.

And if you want to find a client for the long haul, you need to build that relationship by certain rules.

One of those rules is the Customer Journey: attract → engage → sell → retain.

This is a story about how a business builds long-term relationships with its clients.

Here's a quick overview of each step and why it matters.

1. Attract. Potential clients discover you through advertising (any kind).
2. Engage. They start reading and watching your content. They show interest.
3. Sell. The first sale happens.
4. Retain. The client is happy with the result they got. They buy more of your products and services. Average order value increases.

Let me give you a heads-up right away.

What I'm about to share is strategy, not tactics.

This is a blueprint for building an empire. With a solid foundation and fortified walls. Built to last decades — or even centuries.

Of course, you can jump straight to selling cold. That brings in fast money. But in that case, people are buying the product. And in 99% of cases, they're judging you purely on price. It's a valid tactic when you need cash here and now.

On those terms, building long-term relationships is extremely difficult. Chances are, a client like that will leave you the moment they find a lower price from a competitor.

But if you build the Customer Journey from Step One, you have a chance to introduce the potential client to you, to your business, to what makes you different.

In that case, the client won't be buying from you just because they need your specific product. They'll be buying because you're the one selling it — not someone else.

People prefer to buy from those they know and like.

Steps one and two are exactly how you introduce the client to you, build the relationship, and establish trust.

Alright. Let me briefly walk you through each of these steps to give you the full picture. Then we'll dive deep into every step and every element.

Step 1. Attract. Potential clients discover you through your ads or your content.

If we continue with the relationship analogy, this step is like their first meeting.

There's a good chance they won't click — and they'll go their separate ways.

But it's also possible that something sparks between them, and they start paying attention to each other.

The best way to get a potential client to notice you and your business is through the right content.

By "content" I mean:

- written text, in any form;
- video;

- podcasts;
- and anything else that involves passing information from one person to another.

What do I mean by “the right content”? Content that grabs the attention of a potential client. Shows them that you’re an expert in your field. That you know what you’re talking about. You understand their problems and can help them solve them.

At this very first step, all content is built around the potential client.

Not around you and your product.

Think about it yourself — who’s more enjoyable to talk to:

a) someone who’s genuinely interested in you and actually listens?

b) someone who only talks about how great they are, barely bothered to learn your name, and didn’t even remember it?

Obviously, the first one is a pleasure. Business is exactly the same.

Start talking and writing about the client and their world — and they’ll be happy to keep the conversation going.

How and what kind of content to create for this first step.

Write for people, about people, and about their pain points.

The topics of specific content pieces should flow from the questions, problems, beliefs, and desires of your audience.

I personally use an approach called BDF — Beliefs, Desires, Feelings.

Ask yourself: what beliefs are holding your potential clients back from getting results? What do they dream about? What worries or inspires them?

Create content that resonates with those things.

For example, if your niche is language learning, don’t talk about what an expert you are every day. Instead, bust the common fear “I just don’t have a knack for languages" and give a useful tip on how to memorize 100 words in an hour.

Personalize your content for your audience.

Remember: people don't care about you or your content — what matters to them is what value they can get from it.

Dry facts don't sell well. Try to deliver knowledge through short stories, examples, and personal experience. (More on this in later chapters.)

With this approach, readers feel like they're getting real, lived expertise — not abstract theory.

Don't be afraid to give concrete value away for free in your posts: checklists, mini-guides, answers to frequently asked questions. It sounds paradoxical, but the more value you give away in your content, the easier it is to monetize your audience later.

Where to publish this content.

It all depends on where your target audience typically hangs out. What they read and where they do it.

It could be the well-known social networks: Facebook, Instagram, YouTube, TikTok, even Nextdoor.

It could be email, a personal blog on your own domain, or a public platform — niche or general. For everyone, or for industry professionals.

Or it's possible your potential clients don't watch YouTube, don't use social media, and don't read email. Maybe they read expert trade journals. All kinds of things are possible. Tap into your inner detective and dig.

I'm 99.9% sure that not a single one of your competitors is doing this kind of research — and it's a great way to find a channel for communicating with potential clients that will feed you and bring in new business for years.

Your competitors will think you're just lucky. But you're not just lucky. You're smart-lucky. Building your luck with your own mind and hands.

How often to publish content.

Ideally — a piece of content on a relevant topic every single day.

The more “content traps” you scatter across the internet (and beyond), the faster you’ll start seeing results.

Remember: at this stage, 10 mediocre pieces of content beats one perfectly polished piece.

A quick life hack for multiplying content.

Here’s how it works.

Write a post or article → film a video on the same topic → strip the audio track and upload it as a podcast → cut the video into short clips.

So one piece of content becomes 5 or even 10.

In summary:

Step one — attracts the attention of a potential client. And if your content landed well, the potential client moves on to...

Step 2. Engage. They keep reading and watching your content. They show interest.

This step is about people getting genuinely interested in your content. They subscribed to your blog, channel, or account.

They watch your YouTube videos, read your posts and articles. They’re watching you.

At this stage, the key is to hold their attention without scaring them off.

The format of your content starts to shift here.

In the very beginning, you were giving them solutions to their problems, answers to their burning questions. At this stage, you start weaving in elements of education, entertainment, and your personality.

1) Your case studies

2) Your experience

3) Your opinions

4) What makes your product or service different from the rest
5) Why your competitors aren't really competitors at all — you're in a league of your own, and your product is the best solution for them.

You're starting to separate yourself from the market. You're creating polarity in the reader's mind: there's you — and then there's everyone else.

This step is foundational by nature.

Implementing it breaks the rules of the game.

With this step, you're creating the most valuable asset in your business — your own base of loyal followers.

You start being associated in their minds as a trusted friend and the #1 expert in your niche. Someone they can trust. You become "one of their own." And when your subscribers need your services or products, they won't be asking themselves "Where do I go?" They'll come straight to you — without even thinking about it.

What matters when creating this type of content:

1) Boldly express your point of view on your niche and what's happening in it.
2) Show your position in life. Talk about your values — what you stand for and what you're fighting against.

(By "fighting against" I mean things like excess weight, a wrong approach to solving a problem, etc. The enemy can be abstract — or very real and concrete.)

This approach will attract those who share your perspective and push away those who don't. The first group will only become more and more loyal.

You don't need to be liked by everyone. That will never happen. The paradox is: the more you polarize your audience, the more money you'll make.

At this stage, the potential client still hasn't given you their contact details — phone number, email, etc.

So the goal of this step isn't to sell a product. It's to move the relationship to a deeper level.

To build even more trust and get them to go from being a passive observer on your blog or Facebook page — to being a subscriber on your mailing list.

Doesn't matter which kind — an email newsletter or a text list.

Building that subscriber base is the single most important task for any business that wants to succeed.

And honestly, my personal view: the subscriber base is the most valuable asset in any business. Every business absolutely must treat this base with care — building real human relationships with it daily. And constantly working to grow it.

(The tool for moving someone from step two to step three is called the Lead Magnet. I'll cover it in detail in a separate chapter.)

Once a potential client has entered your subscriber base, they move to the next stage.

Step 3. Sell.

Sometimes, at this stage, people can stay "warm" for years. Seriously — I've had people read my stuff for 7 years before reaching out.

But in reality, it usually happens much faster. Some people move to the next step within days. Others within weeks. Some need to "marinate" for a few months.

It all depends on the niche and the product you're selling, as well as the decision-making timeline. So I don't have hard statistics for you on this.

On average, you're looking at one to three months before people start buying your products and services.

At the first step, we attract with content that focuses primarily on solving problems. At the second step, we add some entertainment and personality.

But at the step where we're aiming for that first sale, we need to add more entertainment and dial back the education.

Let me explain.

A quick note on basic neuroscience.

Our brain is responsible for just two core functions: preserving life and continuing life.

That's it.

At the first step, when the brain encounters content with a solution to a problem — it gets interested. Because in that moment, it's performing its life-protection function.

If the potential client didn't immediately buy the solution to their problem, it means the problem isn't urgent enough.

The brain relaxes.

No more problem.

But if we start hammering them with solutions to a problem they don't care about, we become the problem.

Because we're making the reader's brain work, making them think. And thinking burns energy. And burning unnecessary energy is a potential threat to survival.

The moment the brain recognizes our content as a threat, we get blocked.

Everything looks different when our content becomes more entertaining than educational.

Here's the structure of a message that will keep potential clients engaged... and eventually lead to a sale.

1) A curiosity-provoking headline
2) A story (entertainment)
3) A lesson from the story, your thoughts on it: “here’s what this teaches us…” (light education)
4) A proposition to buy the product. No hard sell. Just a simple offer.

What can you use as a story?

Absolutely anything.

- A personal story from childhood;
- Something that happened to you today or will happen tomorrow;
- A scene from a favorite movie or series;
- An interesting idea from a book you’re reading;
- A work case study — success or failure;
- Your take on what a competitor did;
- A historical fact;
- Market news…

As you can see, you can package almost anything into a story. What matters is that the story touches the reader. That it’s interesting to them. That they can see themselves in the context of that story.

Here’s an example of a post that entertains and sells.

WHY WEREN’T YOU TOLD THIS FACT?

A pretty fascinating advertising example.

This ad was written in 1951.

Its goal was to sell a television repair manual.

The ad ran with the headline:

“Save up to $100 a year on TV repairs!”

What followed was a description of how any TV owner could repair and tune their own set — and save that same $100 on service and repairs.

It was beautifully written...

But there were no sales.

Because most Americans believed they were incapable of fixing such a technological monster as a TV.

The headline was truthful — but it looked unbelievable to the reader.

So.

To get the reader to believe they could fix their own TV, you'd need to change their belief in themselves.

The task was to prove to the reader that a television isn't more complicated than a toaster. And only after doing that — push the idea of saving $100 on TV repairs.

Here's what was done, and it was done brilliantly.

Everything started with the headline:

"Why Haven't TV Owners Been Told These Facts?"

No claims in the headline. Just a hint that someone has been pulling the wool over the TV owner's eyes. And that? That's easy to believe.

Then the reader is asked a question that seems to limit the market — but in reality guarantees a positive answer from the vast majority:

"Was your television purchased after spring 1947?"

98% of TV owners would say "Yes." In this way, the first lines secure two acknowledgments: you have a TV and it was made after 1947.

This builds the habit of agreeing. Only after that does the specific promise come:

"Then here is the full, uncensored story of how you can avoid repair bills of $15-$20, avoid service fees of $30-$60 per year, and still get the perfect, crisp picture you've been dreaming of!"

Once the reader's attention is captured, you can start changing their beliefs.

What follows is a story explaining that a TV is simple and that anyone can fix it with a screwdriver. And about how TVs can run for six months straight without being turned off, with proof from the manufacturers.

And that repairmen who charge $100 for a repair aren't any smarter than the reader — they just know certain secrets. And that the reader can learn those secrets too...

Then came the sale of the TV repair manual.

In the end, the ad ran successfully for several decades...

How can you apply this in life?

Very simply.

Before launching your next ad campaign, make sure it's believable. And if people don't believe it, create a lead-in that will change their mind.

Although... the simplest way to do that is by running a proper email newsletter.

Like this one you're reading right now.

How to do it? Details here →

Perhaps you're now asking yourself:

What's the point of all this?

Why should I be entertaining potential clients who aren't buying?

Here's why.

Here's a pattern I've seen in almost every niche. Most sales don't happen after the first touchpoint.

Not after the 7th.

Not after the 20th.

They happen after many touchpoints — often dozens, sometimes a hundred. That's when people who've been reading you for a while finally say yes.

Of course, there's no magic number. But as practice shows, the people who keep reading your newsletter are the ones most likely to become clients.

That might happen in six months or in a year.

But there's something worth fighting for here. You'd agree.

And obviously, to keep a subscriber engaged for that long, educational posts alone won't cut it.

Educational posts alone can hold attention only for so long. After that, the reader's brain surrenders and finds a thousand reasons to stop learning — because it's draining.

And anything draining gets blocked by the brain.

I already told you that.

So, to wrap it up.

Your newsletter needs to become infotainment.

Your newsletter needs to become your potential client's favorite TV series.

And every message will be awaited like a new episode of their favorite show — with you as the beloved main character.

A newsletter like this creates another crucial effect.

Reading you every day, the potential client automatically starts to see you as the market leader. That's another quirk of the brain.

The reader will begin to associate your entire market with you, your newsletter, and your name.

And that's worth a lot.

Because in that scenario, you become "number one" in the client's eyes. And sooner or later, they'll show up and buy your product.

And recommend you to others.

I'll walk you through exactly how to lead a potential client into a sale in the "Offers" section.

Important!

So you don't scare off the potential client, don't pressure them with sales. No "buy-buy-buy" hype.

There should be no desperation in the sale.

What does that mean?

It means that everything about you — your demeanor, your behavior, every comma in your text — communicates:

"It would be great if you bought my product, because it's genuinely good and I believe in it. But if you don't, I won't suffer. I have plenty of clients even without you."

Paradoxically, this approach only multiplies sales. Many times over.

Because desperation kills any sale. Confidence attracts quality clients with real money.

What and how to sell.

A couple more points worth paying attention to.

What can be the first sale?

Anything!

Just remember the key thing. With their first purchase, the buyer is testing whether they can trust you and your product.

As a rule, a potential client isn't ready to spend a large amount on a first deal. They're much more comfortable starting a financial relationship with someone relatively new to them with a minimal transaction.

You can even start with pay-what-you-want products or one-time consultations.

Set a fixed price for the consultation, and raise it over time as reviews accumulate.

Start with one product. Then add more. Remove what doesn't work, improve what brings results.

Over time, you'll have a TOP-performing lineup of products with the best conversion rates.

Pay close attention to constantly improving your entry product. Because this is where the work with the client doesn't stop — it's actually just beginning.

It's right after the first sale that repeat sales begin. That's when real business starts.

To sum it up.

To build a long-term relationship, you need to guide the client through three steps: attract, engage, sell.

Building these relationships happens through content.

And at each step, that content has its own specific characteristics.

At the "attract" step, we use content focused exclusively on the problems and goals of our potential client.

We explain how to solve those problems and achieve those goals. In our content, we use the exact language our reader uses when describing their challenges — we speak their language. And we invite them to subscribe to our blog, social media channel, etc.

If the potential client likes our content and is ready to actively consume more, they move to step two.

At the "engage" step, we continue speaking to the potential client in their own language — about their problems and goals — but we start weaving in our personality and point of view. We begin implanting key ideas in their mind: about who we are, our approach, our product, what makes it different. And of course, how it can brilliantly solve their challenges.

At this step, we regularly invite them to move from casual observer to subscriber on our list — using various lead magnets.

At the “sell” step, we shift our approach to content.

To keep the client with us as long as possible, we lean more into entertainment with a light touch of education.

If in the early steps content is mostly educational, at this stage it becomes infotainment.

Each infotainment piece subtly sells. But from a place of “I really want to help you solve your challenges. I can do it with my product. I want to — but I don’t need to.”

If you do everything right, your conversion to sale will climb — and keep climbing.

And your competitors will be nervously watching from the sidelines.

However, the Customer Journey actually begins with one more step. A step zero — and the most important one. One I haven’t mentioned yet.

Every marketer knows it. 99% of entrepreneurs know about it.

But barely anyone actually does it.

You could call it the absolute foundation of all marketing. Without it, there’s no marketing — just friction.

I’m talking about...

CHAPTER 2

Target Audience Analysis

So.

Every piece of frictionless marketing starts with this step.

Fair warning up front — this is the most boring activity your brain will ever face. So your brain will do everything it can to boycott it.

The entrepreneurial brain loves creative, large-scale tasks.

For example, designing a multi-tiered, branching automated sales funnel is extremely exciting work.

Dopamine goes through the roof, and the brain has an absolute blast with a task like that.

But analyzing and studying your target audience? Boring as hell.

Because it's not creative and doesn't lead directly to money.

That's exactly why there are no courses on target audience analysis in the info-business world. No demand for them.

But there are a million courses on automated funnels and chatbots.

But either way, if we want marketing to be profitable, we need to know exactly what our clients want.

So we can offer them precisely that.

The biggest mistake a marketer makes is thinking they can create demand.

That's an illusion.

The whole point of frictionless marketing is to identify the client's problem, point it out to them, make it real in their mind, and then present the best possible solution using our product.

In marketing terms — make them an offer (there's a dedicated chapter on creating offers).

We're not selling our product. We're selling the solution to their problem using our product!

And to sell them the solution, we need to understand the problem.

Even better than they understand it themselves.

Alright, let's dig in.

Let's break down the questions you need to answer to craft a killer offer for your target audience.

Stage 1. 5 Questions That Help You Understand Your Clients and Make Your First Decent Offer.

Early in my career as a marketer, I encountered — and still encounter — countless different audience analysis methodologies and interview techniques.

Some are incredibly advanced. For example, in early 2021 I conducted over 80 interviews for a single project. Each averaged about an hour and a half. Then I spent dozens more hours analyzing the data.

Over years of working with target audience analysis, I've concluded that at the first stage, there's no need to spend 80-100 hours on research. To make a solid offer and test it, you only need to work through five questions.

And with a tool like artificial intelligence in your hands, this task can be solved in literally an hour.

Let's work through these five questions in order. I'll explain how to properly work with each one and why it matters.

Question #1. Who is my ideal client?

Everything starts here.

You absolutely need to understand who you want to work with — and who you don't want anything to do with.

Please — don't say "my clients are any males aged 18–65 who have money."

Be specific.

For example: Mike, 35, married, has kids, loves his work, is always learning, looks for new things and applies them. Wants to make the world better. Spiritually developing. Earns $7k+/month.

Describe what the person loves, their hobbies, what they hate — and so on.

After that, you can go further.

You can take that description, feed it to AI, and ask it to generate a realistic photo of this ideal client.

Pick the one you like best, print it out, and put it up where you work on your marketing.

When you're writing a sales page or a post, look at the photo and ask yourself: "Would this actually land for them?"

Seems silly, but it's not.

The brain hates ambiguity — it loves specificity. And a photo of your ideal client is very specific.

Once you do this exercise, your marketing will unquestionably improve.

Neat little brain-level magic, right there.

Why else do we need to know the portrait of the ideal client?

Whether we like it or not, we dedicate a huge chunk of our lives to business. So ask yourself: do you want to spend that time having a blast working with genuinely pleasant people — or dealing with the ones who make you want to pull your hair out?

Moreover, when you sell to ideal clients and don't waste time on difficult personalities, you start earning more while stressing and worrying less.

Agree — for a reward like that, it's worth taking my word for it and working through this exercise, including printing out the photo of your ideal client.

I'll be honest — it took me four years to believe in the effectiveness of this step. And I deeply regretted not doing it from the very beginning.

> AI PROMPT
> Take on the role of an experienced entrepreneur and expert with many years of experience who successfully sells [BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF YOUR PRODUCT OR SERVICE]. You deeply understand your niche, know who your ideal client is, and know how to build long-term, profitable relationships with them.
> Describe in maximum detail the portrait of the ideal client — the one who:
> - generates the most profit;
> - values quality and your professionalism;
> - works with you easily, without unnecessary drama;
> - understands the value of your product and doesn't haggle.
> Break it down through:
> 1. Who they are (personality type, occupation, income level, mindset, values).
> 2. What motivates them to buy specifically from you.
> 3. How they make decisions and what they pay attention to.
> 4. Their pains, desires, and internal criteria for an "ideal deal."
> Before you begin the task, ask me step-by-step as many questions as you need to complete the task 100%.

If you don't want to answer the questions or don't know how, ask the AI to answer them itself based on common sense and logic.

Question #2. What end result does my ideal client want?

When asking yourself this question, you need to identify what your potential client is ultimately striving toward.

Most likely, when solving a problem with your product, the potential client is aiming for something bigger.

Not just for buying your product or service.

What matters here is the final outcome. The Main Goal, the Dream they're moving toward. The biggest pain or problem they want to solve.

So this question deserves serious thought — not a quick, obvious answer.

As famous 20th-century copywriter Eugene Schwartz said: "Sell the green lawn, not the lawn mower."

Let me give you some examples.

People don't want a gym membership.

They want to look better and feel more confident. Or to become fitter so they can run a marathon and feel like a total badass — the kind of person who casually drops that into conversation with friends.

People don't want to learn English.

They want to travel comfortably around the world and chat freely with a waiter at a café. Or to open up new markets and speak the same language as potential business partners.

People don't want that lawn mower — they want a lawn so perfect that the neighbor is consumed by jealousy and goes green with envy.

Your answer to this question will directly affect the power and appeal of your killer offer.

The better your offer works, the more sales you get.

To get an answer to this question, simply copy the entire second question with its description and paste it as a continuation of your existing

AI conversation — specifically an existing one, to preserve the context of the previous prompt and response.

Question #3. What can you give your ideal client to bring them closer to the end result?

Answering this question will help you stand out from the crowd of competitors.

The answer should be your Unique Mechanism — something special that allows the potential client to solve their problem in the best possible way.

This Unique Mechanism is what raises the value of your product.

Note: value, not price. The higher the perceived value of your product in the client's eyes, the easier it is for them to part with their money when buying from you.

You need to describe how this Unique Mechanism helps your client get closer to their Dream — the one I mentioned in question #2.

EXAMPLE:

What makes our gym unique is that before you start training, we run a diagnostic of your body using our proprietary X method — based on your DNA analysis. From that, we create a personalized training and nutrition program. Every session is supervised by a certified trainer. And every month we run a check-up. Thanks to this, you'll see results 2.5x faster and need to push 10x less.

Obviously I'm making this up — but it's to help you get the idea.

Don't settle for clichés. Find something genuinely unique. It's definitely there.

> Now imagine you're that same experienced entrepreneur and expert who sells [BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF PRODUCT OR SERVICE] and already has a clear picture of who your ideal client is (from the previous description).

> Describe what exactly you can give this client to bring them closer to their desired result and help them achieve their main dream. Frame it through your Unique Mechanism — that special solution, method, system, approach, technology, process, or philosophy through which the client:
> - achieves results faster, easier, and with fewer risks;
> - gets more value than from comparable offers on the market;
> - feels like your product was specifically made for them.
> Break it down:
> 1. What your Unique Mechanism is (what it is and how it works).
> 2. Why it specifically helps the client achieve their dream.
> 3. How it's fundamentally different from standard solutions on the market.
> 4. What specific results, emotions, or advantages it gives the client.
> Write from the perspective of the entrepreneur — confidently and with passion, like someone who's proud of their product and believes in its power.
> Before you begin the task, ask me step-by-step as many questions as you need to complete the task 100%.

Question #4. What problem is keeping my ideal client up at night?

At first glance, this seems like a silly question. It's not. It's one of the most important questions.

Why?

Because you can only sell the solution to a problem using your product if that problem is already making someone's life miserable. So miserable that the potential client is losing sleep over it.

Sure, I'm exaggerating a bit — but here's the key insight: a sale only happens when the client has a problem they're aware of, want to solve, and think about constantly.

We buy a new car when the old one finally drives us crazy.

We buy a new apartment when the current one becomes unbearable — or we can't stand living with our parents or in a rental anymore.

We go to the dentist when painkillers stop working and we're up at night with agonizing pain.

We hire a psychologist only when we realize it's the only way to solve our issues.

We buy a new drill only when we need a hole in the wall. Not before. Well — unless a man suddenly feels a surge of handyman spirit and starts buying every tool in sight just to feed that urge.

So describe in vivid detail what's making your potential client wake up at 3 AM, walk to the kitchen, sit down, and start stress-eating anything within reach because of their problem...

Understanding that problem lets you point it out — and then present the solution using your product.

> AI PROMPT

Question #5. Where can I find them?

For our potential clients to see our offer, we need to find exactly the right place where that makes the most sense.

And it won't necessarily be some social media platform or search engine.

Your ideal channel for communicating with clients might be a trade magazine or newspaper. Or even direct mail. Don't dismiss these unpopular advertising methods. There's a real chance they could bring you a ton of extra sales.

A quick note on "spam."

Spam is an inappropriate offer made at the wrong time and in the wrong place.

But if you choose the right platform and identify the client's pains and goals correctly — your message won't be spam. Because it'll be right on point: in the right place at the right time.

And when you write your irresistible offer, keep in mind the context of the place where you'll be showing it.

AI PROMPT

Identify 5-10 places where you can most often find your ideal client — places where they already are mentally, emotionally, and physically when they're thinking about their problems and dreams.

Break down each option by:

1) Where the client is (online and offline channels, media, communities, situations, locations, events).
2) Why they're open to your offer there (context, triggers, mindset).

> 3) What format works best for reaching them (content, ads, personal outreach, referrals, etc.).
> 4) How to make your message feel relevant, useful, and “on point” — not like spam.
> 5) An example of a specific contact scenario (situation + communication format).
> Don’t limit yourself to social media — consider any possible touchpoints: from LinkedIn and Facebook groups to business journals, professional conferences, or offline events.
> Tone: strategic, confident, with a focus on understanding the client and finding the “right place and right moment.”
> Before you begin the task, ask me step-by-step as many questions as you need to complete the task 100%.

Working through these five questions will take you no more than an hour. And based on this work, you can already build your first offer — one you can put into the market right away.

(For how to put an offer together — see the dedicated chapter below.)

At this moment, many people make one fatal mistake: they try to make everything perfect right away.

You don’t need to do that.

Perfect on the first try isn’t going to happen.

Do it decently — a solid C grade — and launch it right away. And chances are, even that “C grade” version will be a head and shoulders above everything else on the market.

Your goal is to get as many offers out to the market as fast as possible.

The more you make and the faster you make them, the sooner you’ll find the offer that starts generating sales.

Many people think you can create a killer offer that works from the very first try.

That's not how it works. The difference between an inexperienced marketer and an expert is that the expert makes fewer mistakes. But they still make them.

And you know how an inexperienced person becomes an expert?

They make a ton of mistakes. And they figure out what doesn't work. And then, over and over, cutting away everything that isn't working, they arrive at a set of tools that do.

That's how experience is built — through mistakes.

How to relate to mistakes and failures.

You'll have them. Guaranteed.

As I always tell the people I teach:

Be like researchers in a lab. You run an experiment, get a negative result, write it down in your notebook that this approach doesn't work — and go run the next experiment. Treat every failure as a step toward success. Nothing else. And you'll be just fine.

Once you've confirmed that your hypothesis hit the mark, you can move to the next stage of audience analysis.

This is the next level — it will add color and emotion to your irresistible offer. It'll make it richer and attract even more new clients. But fair warning: it's a bit harder and takes longer than those five basic questions.

The five basic questions are just the first stage. Let me now walk you through two more stages of audience analysis.

On AI prompts for the second stage:

Compile everything the AI gave you into a single document, adjust as needed, and paste it into a new conversation. Set a role as before, direct it to the data in the uploaded document, and then simply copy the blocks from this book step by step and give them as tasks for further research. Do all the research in a single conversation. Review the responses and correct where needed. AI can hallucinate sometimes.

Stage 2. The Empathy Map.

I can't remember who invented this method of audience analysis — doesn't matter. I started using it actively once I understood just how powerfully emotions affect sales. In fact, emotions are what trigger the impulse to buy.

Purchasing decisions are made at the emotional level first — then logic kicks in with its evidence base.

We first want a new car (because the old one finally bores us to tears), and then we logically search for reasons why the old one just isn't cutting it anymore and why we absolutely need a new one.

Let's break down the empathy map in detail.

The empathy map: four quadrants around your client, plus their pains and dreams.

Quadrant #1. What does the person think and feel?

- About their pain, problem, dream, or goal?
- About the path to their end result?
- About their capabilities?
- About their successes and failures?
- About life situations connected to your niche?

The more details you can gather, the better. Each detail makes the picture clearer. Don't stop at 2-3 obvious facts. Dig deeper.

Quadrant #2. What does the person see?

- Do they see your promises as real?
- Do they see what's happening in your niche?
- Do they see what's being said about it online?
- Do they see other people's successes?
- Or do they see more failures?
- Do they see news from your niche — and what kind?
- Do they see competitors and what they're doing?
- Do they see anyone who managed to solve their problem?

Humans are social creatures. So, in order to make a decision, they need to understand how other members of their community relate to it. Whether they'll be judged for buying. Whether their status will rise or fall in others' eyes. All of that matters.

Quadrant #3. What does the person say and do?

- What do they say to their family, friends, and close ones about their pain or dream?
- What do they say online?
- What questions do they ask? And what do they actually do?
- Does what they say match what they do? If not — how big is the gap? And why?

- Is it a lack of knowledge, or is the desire something society pressured on them — so they're not burning for it and not pushing toward action?

Quadrant #4. What does the person hear?

- What do their close ones, friends, and acquaintances tell them?
- Are they skeptical of their ideas?
- Or are they supportive?
- What do they hear from their "guru" (by "guru" I mean the people whose opinions they respect)?
- What do they hear from the guru's followers?
- What do they hear about your niche in general — on TV, radio, or online?

I'll say it again. Humans are social creatures — which means the opinion of those around them has a dominant influence on the minds of our potential clients. If society believes your product doesn't work and is genuinely bad, you won't be able to sell it. Even if it's incredible. Fighting public opinion is a losing battle.

Pains and Dreams

Start with the biggest and most significant, then move to the more targeted and specific.

For example, a beginning entrepreneur's main pain might be low sales and barely scraping by. A more specific pain might be that their family doesn't believe in their success and pressures them to get a regular job. Or that their audience barely responds to ads and they don't know how to grab people's attention.

Careful work on the empathy map will help you understand more deeply the emotions and desires of your potential client — the ones that actually drive the decision to buy your product or not.

We (people) think of ourselves as rational beings who make decisions based on reason and logic.

Maybe that's partially true.

We do rely on reason when we're in our comfort zone. But under stress and pain, reason takes a back seat and the limbic brain — the emotional one — takes the wheel. And since the limbic brain is more powerful than the prefrontal cortex, once it's in charge, reason doesn't stand a chance.

And as we've already discussed, a sale happens precisely when someone has a problem and it's bothering them. That triggers emotions. Which means rational thinking is switched off.

A real example that happened to me just today.

I've known for about two months that I need to replace the water filter we use for tea, coffee, and cooking.

My rational mind knew the time had come. That it had run its six-month cycle. But I wasn't doing it. Simply because it wasn't bothering me. Then this morning, when I was heating water for coffee, I noticed an unpleasant smell. And immediately my brain conjured up an image of all the gross stuff that must have built up in that filter... bacteria multiplying unchecked, and my whole family drinking it... That image was enough for me to immediately order a new filter.

Emotion made me buy — not reason.

It's a bit unsettling to accept this reality. But that's life.

So don't underestimate your clients' emotions. Consciously work with them — to genuinely help your clients solve their problems.

How to use the empathy map data.

Let me walk through an abstract example. The one we wrote about earlier — the incredibly awesome gym.

As a reminder, here's what we had earlier:

What makes our gym unique is that before you start training, we run a diagnostic using our proprietary X method based on DNA analysis. From this, we create a personalized training and nutrition program.

Every session is supervised by a certified trainer. And every month we run a check-up. Thanks to this, you'll see results 2.5x faster and need to work 10x less.

Now, with the data from our empathy map research, we can add some color:

You've tried program after program you found online, exhausted yourself, and barely seen any results? Every time you step on the scale or look in the mirror, it's the same story — and it's infuriating? You're starting to wonder: "Am I just lazy? Is this not for me?" The people close to you can see you're putting in the effort — but they joke quietly: "So what, you're sweating it out for nothing again?" You get frustrated but say nothing. And deep down, you're already ready to give up.

Try our offer. Just a couple of weeks into your personalized training program and you'll feel real results for the first time. The jeans that used to squeeze now zip up with ease. A waistline appears. Your muscles look more defined. You feel light and energized — in a way you haven't in a long time.

The people around you start noticing the change and saying: "You look amazing — something's different?" And your friends quietly envy your discipline and results.

The emotions overflow: pride, joy, the feeling that you're in control of your body and your life. This is no longer "something I have to do" — it's something you love, something everyone around you can see.

Got it?

Feel the difference?

That's exactly it. Always use emotions in sales. The profit boost it delivers is incredible.

After this, you can add all the data you've gathered to your master document and use it when creating ads and sales materials. It's simple — set a role, refer it to the document, and write the task. Like: "create a ... based on the available data."

And now — hardcore mode...

Stage 3. 14 Questions.

I want to note that the first two stages are already more than enough to craft an excellent offer or ad message.

But if you want to break into the top 1%, stage 3 is the perfect tool to rocket your sales into the stratosphere.

Let's go.

Launching your sales rocket

Launch!

Question #1. What is my client's greatest pain?

At the most basic level of brain function, everything that keeps us alive is governed by the reptilian brain. Then the limbic system kicks in, and finally — the cerebral cortex.

To be blunt, the brain has just two basic needs that take priority: preserving life and continuing life.

Both are controlled by the reptilian brain — which runs deeper than our emotions and rational thinking. In other words, our brain is constantly trying to run away from pain (preserve life) and run toward pleasure (continue life — i.e., sex).

90% of the reptilian brain's neural impulses are wired to detect pain, and only 10% to seeking pleasure.

That's why avoiding pain is five times more powerful a motivator for humans than seeking pleasure. Which makes biological sense from a species-survival standpoint: first secure safety, then reproduce.

So if you know what the single greatest pain is for your client — the one you can help them avoid using your product — you have almost everything you need to make successful sales.

Question #2. What does my client consider their pain/problem, and how do they describe it?

The answer to this question tells us whether our client is aware of the root cause of their problem — or whether they're only seeing the symptom.

For example, if a man says he wants to lose weight, that's just the surface of his pain. Most likely, he wants to be healthier and feel more confident — to keep up with his kids, or to stop feeling like the slowest one in the room.

We're trying to get to the deepest root of our clients' motives and behaviors — so we can speak to what they actually want.

This is exactly the point where ethics becomes most important. Because we're essentially getting the keys to influence people.

Which is why everything we do must come from love for our client — not from a desire to make money any way possible, or a craving to control and manipulate.

And when our ad message later talks about weight loss, we promise that our potential client won't just lose weight with our product — they'll also feel more confident, have more energy and keep up with the people they love.

Important!

Describe pains and problems in the client's own words — not your professional jargon and certainly not medical terminology.

As you can see, this kind of addition multiplies the power and appeal of your promise many times over.

Question #3. What keeps my client from sleeping at night?

As you can see, this question overlaps with the fourth question from Stage 1: “What problem is keeping my ideal client up at night?”

So if you worked through that one well from the start, simply confirm you answered it correctly. Or dig even deeper — just to be sure!

In this question, focus on the emotions the potential client experiences.

Their emotional state that’s preventing them from living normally and sleeping soundly — creating constant stress.

Question #4. What terrifies my client?

The answer to this question helps you understand how deep their emotions run.

And yes — it’s not always possible to answer this one clearly, or even at all. It’s possible that in your niche, such intense feelings and emotions just don’t exist.

For example, if your product is drilling water wells, your client probably isn’t lying awake at night thinking they and their family will run out of water and die of thirst.

Then again, context is everything. If your client lives somewhere with frequent droughts, the thought of running out of water might very well make them break into a cold sweat.

And yes — if you do find that kind of emotion, use it very carefully. It’s an incredibly powerful psychological lever.

Question #5. What is the greatest danger my client hasn’t seen or realized yet?

This question helps you strengthen your ad message.

Take weight loss as an example again.

You can point out that if the client leaves things as they are, it could lead to serious health problems down the road.

And describe what that would mean for their life.

Feel the emotional charge?

After a statement like that, your client will feel an even stronger urge to take charge of their health and get their weight under control — using your product.

Question #6. What are my client's three biggest daily irritants?

Answers to this question show your potential client that their life right now isn't exactly a bed of roses — and they urgently need to change it for the better.

An example?

Back to the weight loss niche — it's the most relatable for most people.

Someone struggling with excess weight might have these daily irritants:

1) they avoid photos with friends and family — and it quietly hurts;
2) they're constantly short of breath and can't exercise like they used to or take walks in the park, even though they really want to;
3) they're deeply self-conscious about their appearance and think that's why they're alone...

As you can see, there's a huge range of options here to strengthen your offer and pour more fuel on the fire.

With this kind of data, we can either amplify the pain — by showing just how bad things are — or strengthen the offer by showing how much better things could be.

Question #7. Who does my client blame for their failures?

A fascinating fact: the overwhelming majority of people blame everyone and everything around them for their problems — except themselves.

Not good, not bad.

Just a fact.

So why not use it?

In the weight problem, people blame fast food chains, excess sugar in food, and the impossibility of resisting delicious cinnamon rolls. They're the ones at fault, not the person themselves.

This removes their sense of responsibility and makes it easier to take on external enemies rather than themselves.

That's human nature. You can't change it — but you can use it to help: give them a way to win against those "enemies" instead of blaming themselves.

In a sales letter, this data is used in a context like:

"The enemies are everywhere, they never sleep, it's not your fault that they keep attacking you. We have a solution and protection from these external enemies."

Question #8. What are my client's greatest opportunities?

If the previous questions were all about pain and suffering, this one marks the beginning of describing the bright future of our potential client.

Agreed — you can't keep scaring people with the stick. Sometimes you need to show the carrot.

In this question, we reveal the obvious things the client could gain if they solve their problems using our product.

If before we were describing what they want to run away from, now we're describing what they're moving toward.

Describe not just the situation itself — but the feelings and emotions your potential client will experience.

You can also add how the people around them will react to their transformation. That's an extremely important moment too.

You're describing the obvious near-term perspective.

Question #9. Are there opportunities your client doesn't know about yet?

In this question, we show what possibilities await them in the longer term — things they've never even thought about.

An example to make it clear. Back to the weight loss niche.

In question 8, we tell them how their health will improve in a week. How they'll have more energy. How in a month, people around them will start noticing and complimenting their slimmer waist. How in 6–8 months, they can reach their ideal shape and feel like they're 16 again.

In question 9, we can describe how their body will respond to the changes: no more shortness of breath, better sleep, more energy and fewer sick days. You can talk about mood, focus and a thousand and one other bonuses of losing weight.

Don't hold back when describing all the positive aspects of life awaiting them — even things they didn't know were possible.

Just imagine how much stronger your sales copy gets with this kind of detail.

Question #10. What are your client's dreams and hopes?

If the previous two questions called for fairly rational answers, the answer to this one might be completely irrational.

For example, the potential client might dream that at a class reunion next year, all their old classmates will be amazed at their transformation.

The potential client might hope to live to 120 and see their great-great-great-grandchildren. Or to live long enough for the anniversary edition of their favorite video game to drop.

Any dream — even the wildest one — could be in there.

You can absolutely put them in your sales copy. Some readers will laugh and get a mood boost. Others will feel it deep in their heart — and their wallet.

Question #11. Who or what inspires your client?

The answer to this question doesn't give us direct material for writing sales copy and offers. But it gives us insight into the inner world of the potential client.

Chances are your potential client watches certain YouTube channels. Follows specific "gurus" on social media. Reads specific books and blogs.

Knowing this, you can study what they're saying, what topics they're covering, what they're selling and through what ideas they're doing it.

This gives you even more levers for influencing the mind of your potential client.

Through questions like these, you start understanding the inner world and motivations of your audience even better than they understand themselves.

Question #12. What does your client secretly dream about more than anything?

This is one of the hardest questions.

And finding the answer isn't easy — because your client is unlikely to talk about it openly anywhere.

So you'll have to test different hypotheses here and see what resonates — and what doesn't.

The good news is, with AI in your corner, you can find the right key much faster than before.

What might this secret desire look like?

For example, an entrepreneur might secretly want to prove to all their family and friends that they're not a failure. That they didn't waste all those years "doing their own thing instead of getting a real job." They desperately want to prove everyone wrong.

Personally, this was an incredibly powerful driver for me. Honestly, I think it was the main thing that helped me achieve what I have today.

It's a very strong motivator for action — but it's not something you talk about in polite company.

But it will create a powerful emotional connection to you and your product.

Some additional recommendations here.

As I said, you can't just discover the secret dream upfront. So you'll need to form hypotheses and test them. Do it carefully, like a researcher in your lab. Record everything — and note what works and how.

Sooner or later, you'll find the answer.

And when you do, you'll be able to multiply your sales several times over. Just by answering this one difficult question about your audience.

Question #13. What does your client need to hear to feel good about buying?

We need the answer to this question specifically to strengthen the offer. Or more precisely — its guarantee section.

This is a broad question, so there can be many right answers.

The answer might be proof of the quality and effectiveness of your product. It might be testimonials from existing clients who've used your product and gotten results.

It might be an extended money-back guarantee that removes all risk from the buyer.

It might be the rationalization of an irrational desire. For example, rationally proving why someone needs another new sports car — when they already have a minivan for family trips and an SUV for off-roading. (I'm exaggerating, obviously.)

In short. This question can reveal multiple small elements that help the client decide to take your offer.

Question #14. How does your client explain their desire to buy to others?

People make purchasing decisions emotionally. That's been proven over and over by countless studies.

First, the desire arises at the subconscious level. The purchase decision is made there too. Once the decision is made, the limbic system signals the prefrontal cortex to logically justify the need for the purchase.

And while you can get away with a half-baked rationalization for yourself — for others, you need to construct a bulletproof logical case proving you're not being an idiot. That you're making this purchasing decision through cold calculation, not on emotion.

And that's often really hard to do.

But people can't just do something and not care what others think.

We're social creatures. We need approval and support from those around us. We need to maintain — or even raise — our status in their eyes.

So you absolutely need to give them a reason why a membership at your gym costs three times what others charge. And that reason needs to be airtight.

So your potential client completely agrees with it themselves — and can use it in conversations with their family. They need to justify why they're pulling three times more from the household budget than what's "normal" for these kinds of expenses.

And on that note, we're done with the questions.

In reality, these aren't all the questions I work with. But this is more than enough to become the best in your niche.

And if you're not the type to rest on your laurels, feel free to expand this list with your own questions — whatever matters most for your business.

The more questions you work through, the more deeply you understand your audience — and the better it is for you and your wallet.

If you decide to work through Stage 3 using AI, follow the same algorithm as Stage 2. But personally, at this stage I'd already switch to the old-fashioned approach — interviews with real clients. With one caveat: only interview people who have already bought your product. Not people who might buy, wanted to buy but didn't.

Why do I lean toward doing Stage 3 in the field? Because here you're uncovering nuances in human behavior that AI simply can't detect.

And now let's move to a section on why I trust AI data so much.

Why I Trust Data from AI.

If someone had asked me "where do you get your audience research data?" just a year ago...

I would have immediately pointed them to interviews and the vast stretches of the internet: competitors' websites and social media, niche forums, and so on.

But today I confidently point them to AI.

Let me explain why.

In early 2021, my team conducted extensive research for one of our projects. I personally spent over 150 hours on interviews. I asked buyers of our main product more than 30 questions. Then we spent about a month consolidating all the data. Cross-referencing it in tables across different parameters. We ultimately identified 3 main buyer segments and 5 sub-segments.

Titanic work, honestly. It took us 4.5 months. The results were incredible. Based on them, we "killed" the main product and created three different ones — one for each segment.

Today, we give AI the role and ask it to immediately segment the audience. Describe those three TA segments who need our product.

And you know what?

It produced essentially the same data we'd gotten from that titanic research effort. The match was remarkably close.

So today, artificial intelligence does analysis so well that you can already trust it with this work.

I've since tried taking the AI data immediately and building marketing directly on it.

And the results have been excellent across the board. Hitting the mark — right from the first try.

So today I can say with confidence:

"For initial audience research data, you can go straight to AI. The data will be close enough to start."

Working with AI will give you your first sales.

Just take it and do it.

As the great Dan Kennedy says, success in business depends on just two things: the ability to make offers and making lots of them, fast.

I've dedicated an entire chapter to how to make offers. If making them fast and in volume was a problem before, AI has now solved that problem completely.

Moving on.

Let's say you did the research using my prompts. The AI gave you several hypotheses. Based on those hypotheses you created offers and immediately tested them in the market.

The biggest mistake you can make at this stage is to make one offer and stop there. Draw conclusions from a single iteration.

That's fundamentally wrong.

Because some of your offers won't work at all. Some will give mediocre results. And some will work really well.

And you can't predict which one will hit. You need to build up a pool of tested hypotheses to understand the trends.

Let's say you did everything right and found several offers that start bringing you consistent results.

Please — don't stop there. There are no offers in the world that work forever. They constantly need to be improved and updated.

You need to look for what I call the edges: what matters most to clients, what's less significant.

Basically, these methods of market and audience analysis are more than sufficient.

Use them.

Playing the Game Called "Marketing."

Since you're one of the rare few who actually sees things through to the end, I want to give you a gift: a parable that helped me through the toughest times.

Let's call this parable

The Multi-Sided Die.

Imagine you're playing a dice game with a friend.

Each of you gets one die. One has 20 sides. The other has 200.

On each die, only one side is green. All the rest are red.

The goal of the game is simple: roll green as many times as possible.

The rules are:

- You only see the result of each roll — red or green.
- If green comes up, one of the red sides turns green, and you roll again.
- If red comes up — you just roll again on your turn.

- The game continues as long as you keep rolling. Stop rolling — you lose.

The game begins. You roll the die.

If red comes up, you wait for your friend to take their turn, then take the die and roll again. When green comes up, you roll out of turn.

You keep repeating this to yourself like a mantra: “The more I roll, the more green I get.”

At first, green comes up rarely. But as more and more red sides turn green, the greens come up more often. With enough rolls, getting green becomes the norm rather than the exception.

What’s your friend doing in the meantime?

They roll a few times and keep getting red. They see you get green and complain that your die must have fewer sides. That’s the only way you could have rolled green before them.

In any case, frustrated, they roll a few more times and land on green. But then they complain that it took too long.

They spend more time watching you and complaining than simply rolling their die.

Then you roll again and get green. They say: “How is that even fair? This game is rigged. You just get luckier than me. It’s not fair.”

And they quit.

What’s the point of the game? Who got the 20-sided die, and who got the 200-sided one?

In reality — it doesn’t matter much.

Yes, the 200-sided die will take longer to go fully green than the 20-sided one. But both can only go green if you keep rolling. And stop paying attention to everyone else.

With enough rolls, every die will eventually go completely green.

At the beginning of the game called “Business,” each of us receives one of these multi-sided dice.

You don’t know how “good” other players’ starting positions were — you can only see how well they’re playing right now.

But if you understand the game, you also know it doesn’t matter.

Some start playing early. Others start much later. And some just sit on the sidelines complaining that other players are luckier than they are.

Either way, players “get lucky” more because they’re playing. And when red comes up — which happens often at the start — they don’t quit. They roll again and again.

Learning marketing in many ways resembles playing with this multi-sided die.

You won’t know if you can play until you try. And when you first start, the chances are you’ll land on red more often.

But if you roll your die enough times, green will come up.

And when it does, you’ll have even better odds of making it happen again.

The more you roll, the easier it becomes to land green. You start to understand the game. No matter how many players there are or how many sides your die has, you begin to see:

1) The more rolls you make, the better your results.

2) If you stop, you lose.

The only way to win this game is to start rolling your die — and keep rolling it long enough. No matter what anyone else is doing. No matter how often red comes up at the start.

Because sooner or later, your die will be completely green.

Remember this when you start playing the game called “Marketing.”

CHAPTER 3

The Secret to Creating a Lead Magnet That Works Like Crazy and Brings Your Ideal Clients Into Your Business

> A note on sources: the lead magnet framework in this chapter builds on Alex Hormozi's book $100M Leads. I recommend reading it in full.

So.

We've covered the fundamentals: we analyzed our target audience and the market. Now let's move on to the actual marketing.

As you'll recall, to sell to a client, you first need to draw them into your information field. And to do that, you first need to capture their attention.

In this chapter, we're going to talk specifically about attracting the attention of our target audience. Attracting it through a tool called the lead magnet. And about how to build quality lead magnets.

The better your lead magnet, the more qualified the audience you attract to your business. An audience that will happily pay you — without asking for discounts.

Before we go any further, let's get our definitions straight: what exactly is a lead magnet, and what is a lead?

A lead magnet is a structure that attracts (magnets) leads into a business.

And what is a lead?

A subscriber?

A phone number?

A social media account?

Someone who sees your content?

Someone who clicks on an ad?

This is exactly the question that kicks off the creation of a structure designed to bring you money.

So.

A lead is a person who has expressed interest and whom you can contact.

But not every lead is right for you or ready to buy your product.

The right lead magnet filters this massive pool of leads and delivers only qualified leads into your database.

Qualified leads are people who have a specific problem your product or service can solve — and who have the money they're ready to hand you in exchange for solving it.

These are the people you'll actually be able to sell to.

The Problem This Chapter Solves.

If you're not getting as many leads as you want, there's only one explanation. You're not advertising enough. Full stop. As a result, your potential clients don't even know you or your product exist.

To make more money, your business needs to grow. There are two ways to make it grow:

1) Start getting more clients.

2) "Make" existing clients bring in more money.

We'll cover point two in the next chapters. In this chapter, I'll show you how to attract more clients to your business.

There are four main ways to get more clients: (1) generate more leads; (2) generate higher-quality leads; (3) generate cheaper leads; (4) create a more reliable lead source.

In the end, all else being equal — if you double the number of leads, you double your business.

Lead magnets that sell right away.

The vast majority of businesses go straight for the direct sell from the very first contact. If your target audience is already aware — they understand their problem and know how to solve it — then it makes sense to jump straight to selling. It's quite possible that's the best approach for your business, and you don't need to warm up your audience before the purchase.

Just imagine: you have a toothache. You haven't slept in three days and you've burned through a couple of packs of strong painkillers. You realize the pain definitely isn't going away on its own — you're going to have to see a dentist.

You walk into the office, sit down in the chair, and you're ready for them to do anything to that tooth. Drill it to the root, rip it out and be done with it — whatever it takes. You'll agree to anything, at any price. Just make the pain stop so you can finally sleep.

At that moment, you are the most desirable lead a dentist could ask for.

But.

The dentist read somewhere that leads need to be warmed up with lead magnets. That you need to give them something free and valuable to build trust and all that. So instead of pulling or treating the damn tooth, he starts explaining the correct way to brush your teeth. He hands you a couple of sample tubes of professional toothpaste and suggests you try it out for a week — and then come back for a paid appointment...

I hope you see how absurd that is.

Unfortunately, a lot of people operate exactly like that dentist who overdosed on marketing books.

Instead of selling right away, they start warming people up with lead magnets and all that jazz.

So — advertising your main offer directly might be all you need to engage leads. Try that approach first.

In this case, the lead magnet consists of the following parts:

1) An engaging headline that speaks directly to the target audience and their problem.

2) A description of your unique method for solving the target audience's problem.

3) An explanation of why the target audience hasn't been able to solve this problem with other existing methods on the market.

And beyond that, they pay you with their trust — when they hand over their contact information in exchange for it.

And if someone is willing to give you their time and attention, there's a very good chance they'll give you their money down the line.

Good lead magnets bring in more engaged leads and clients than a standalone main offer ever could... and they do it for less money.

Even free things have a price. People pay you first with their time, and then with money. If your lead magnet isn't worth their time, it's overpriced.

And whether it's free or not — they won't buy from you again.

So look at it from the other side: if they decide your lead magnet is worth their time, they'll decide your main offer is worth their money.

Seven Steps to Creating a Lead Magnet

Step 1: Define what problem you want to solve and who needs it solved

Step 2: Define how to solve it

Step 3: Define how to deliver the lead magnet to the potential client

Step 4: Test the name

Step 5: Make the lead magnet easy to use

Step 6: Make it absolutely mind-blowing

Step 7: Make it easy for your potential clients to tell you what else they want from you

Important note. Make your lead magnet so good that your potential client would feel like an idiot for turning it down.

That's much harder to do than to say. But to pull it off, remember: the winner in this battle will be whoever delivers the greatest value to the market at the lowest price.

Step 1: What problem do you want to solve — and who needs it solved.

Here's a simple example.

This book is a lead magnet. You are my lead. With this book, I want to show you a system you can run on your own — and earn your trust along the way.

Your goal is to attract more leads and get more clients and sales. This lead magnet helps you work toward that goal.

The algorithm for choosing a lead magnet topic is pretty straightforward.

Here's a great example from the real estate niche.

Imagine you're a realtor specializing in luxury property. You need to find clients who want to sell their home. These are high-value clients — you can't just cold-call your way to them. But you can build a relationship with them through lead magnets.

From experience, we know these clients primarily want to know:

- the value of their home (put together a detailed report on current luxury market prices);

- how to increase the home's value (create a complete guide: how to take stunning photos of the house; how to best stage the lawn with contacts for local contractors; how to do a cosmetic renovation for less with referrals to discounted contractors, etc.)

If you've been in your niche for a while, you know your clients' problems inside and out. You'll be able to identify the most pressing ones... and turn them into a great lead magnet.

We simply choose a sub-problem of your potential client — one that leads to their main problem — and give them the solution for free. With the lead magnet, your potential client won't solve their core problem, but they'll understand that you get their pain and you know how to fix it. Through that lead magnet, you'll earn trust and the right to get paid for solving their main problem.

Step 2: Define how to solve the problem

There are three types of lead magnets based on how they solve the potential client's problem.

1) Revealing the problem

2) Trial and sample versions

3) One step from a multi-step process

1) Revealing the problem.

If your audience has a problem they don't know they have, your lead magnet brings it to their attention. This is the case where you can keep your cost per lead to a minimum — catching the potential client before they've even started looking for a solution to their problem.

Real-life example: A friend of mine, an osteopath, invited me in for a free posture assessment. He took a few photos from different angles and showed me the early signs of postural misalignment that were developing. I sit at a computer all day and immediately realized that if it's already starting, it's only going to get worse — so I bought a year-long treatment plan from him right then and there.

2) Trial and sample versions.

You can solve a recurring problem on a short-term basis by offering a trial or sample version of your main offer. This works perfectly for coaches and therapists who work with clients over the long haul. Give your potential client the first session for free — and sell the rest on that session.

A brilliant example of this lead magnet can be found in some network marketing companies.

Amway has been using this method to attract new clients for decades. A rep simply drops off a full basket of various household products for a week. The customer uses them, loves them, and becomes a regular. Then the basket gets passed on to the next lead — ideally someone the new customer just referred. It's basically a perpetual motion machine for generating clients.

3) One step from a multi-step process.

You can give them one step in a multi-step process that solves a bigger problem.

This book is exactly that type of lead magnet. Through the information in this book, I show you how to attract quality leads, how to draw them into your information field, and how to sell to them.

What "try before you buy" showrooms can teach us.

Many, many years ago, trying on clothes before buying wasn't allowed. Then some clever entrepreneur invented the fitting room. Presumably, their sales shot up — so much so that it became standard practice in every clothing store.

Why is the fitting room so effective? Because it's all three types of lead magnets rolled into one.

You get to try something on — like a test run. And it doesn't commit you to anything.

It also reveals the problem.

Trying something on, you might realize you don't actually need it at all — you need something entirely different. You came in for a T-shirt, and while trying it on, you figured out you actually need a dress shirt.

And when you find the perfect shirt and want to buy it... a good salesperson will ask: "Do you need trousers to go with it? We have some that are absolutely perfect for this."

That becomes the first step in a multi-step process of putting together an outfit.

So if you can, try to create a lead magnet that performs all three functions: revealing the problem, letting them try the solution, and presenting it as a small piece of the overall offer.

Step 3: Define how to deliver the lead magnet.

There are a ton of different ways to deliver lead magnets. But there are four main formats: software, information, services, and physical products.

1) Software. You immediately hand your potential clients a tool. Not the easiest type of lead magnet to build, but very effective. It could be an Excel spreadsheet with calculation formulas. It could be an AI bot that generates decent social media posts. It could be a calculator for measuring something. In real estate, mortgage payment calculators are incredibly popular. A marketing agency might provide a unit economics spreadsheet.

2) Information. You provide free educational content that's relevant and valuable to your audience. This can be literally anything: case studies, PDF reports, lessons, recorded presentations, checklists of common mistakes, and so on.
3) Services. You simply do some of your work for free. This is the approach for therapists and coaches. If you're a skilled copywriter, you might write a few free emails for someone's newsletter. It won't take you much effort — and you'll immediately get a sense of the quality of their list and their offer. With this kind of lead magnet, you're not just selling yourself; you're also vetting a potential client.
4) Physical products. These are things your potential clients can hold in their hands. In our information age, this is a highly effective way to generate leads. It's the most expensive approach — but also the most effective. For example, marketing legends like Russell Brunson and Dan Kennedy have been doing this for years, sending potential clients their actual books in the mail. It costs money, but it's far more effective than sending a digital version.

With three types of lead magnets and four delivery methods, you get up to twelve possible combinations — all solving one narrow problem.

All that's left is to test them and find the best combination. The results often surprise you.

A real-world example.

This one is from a project I worked on: a manufacturer of gantry cranes. Finding companies that use them isn't easy. We put together an offer: a complete set of crane slings for a symbolic $100 — when the real market value was $1,000 (it was a genuinely premium set). We ran targeted ads using direct search. Within about three months, we had built a massive database of companies that potentially need a new crane for their warehouse or production facility. By the way, the company manufactured the slings themselves — so the cost of goods was minimal.

Step 4: Testing the name.

David Ogilvy said:

> "When you have written your headline, you have spent eighty cents out of your (advertising) dollar."

This means five times more people read your headline than any other part of your ad.

People see it and make an instant decision: keep reading... or not. As Ogilvy noted, people need to pay attention to your lead magnet before they'll ever use it.

Whether we like it or not, how we present it matters more than we think. For example, improving the headline, title, and visual presentation of a lead magnet can multiply engagement several times over.

That's how important this is.

On top of that — if nobody pays attention to your lead magnet, nobody will ever find out how good it is.

You simply cannot leave this to chance. What do you do? Test!

The results will surprise you. They surprise me every single time.

Step 5: Make the lead magnet easy to use.

Like it or not, our brains are always looking for ways to minimize the number of steps needed to get a result. This has always been true — it's just more pronounced today because of how competitive everything is.

So if we want our lead magnet to be effective, we simply have to adapt to market realities and make it as frictionless to use as possible.

If the lead magnet is inconvenient to use, the potential client won't use it. Which means they won't get a result from it. And if they don't get a result, the chances of any next steps drop to nearly zero.

So make your lead magnet as easy to use as possible.

If you've created a PDF report, format it for mobile reading from the start — because in 95% of cases, that's exactly how it'll be read.

If you've created a video or podcast — try to make it possible to watch or listen at a faster speed (upload to YouTube, at minimum).

Step 6: Make it absolutely mind-blowing.

Let me give you an example.

Say you walk into a bakery to buy bread. Your only goal — grab some bread for lunch.

You walk in and get a stale loaf that's already growing mold by evening.

That's called an unequal exchange. It generates a storm of negativity. You tell everyone you know that this bakery's bread is garbage and that nobody should buy it under any circumstances.

You walk in and get exactly what you came for — a fresh loaf. That's an equal exchange.

You got exactly what you expected. It triggers no feelings whatsoever. Next time you might come back to this bakery, or you might try a different one. Nothing compels you to repeat the experience — unless it's on your way.

You walk in and along with the bread you get a warm smile from the salesperson who's genuinely happy to see you and a pleasure to talk to. And on top of the loaf of bread, you get a little bag with a few small pastries to try.

You love it. And after tasting the wonderful bread and delicious pastries at home, you'll definitely be back at that bakery — and you'll buy more pies and baked goods (assuming you have no issues with flour and sugar, of course). And you'll tell everyone about it and recommend it to your friends.

That's called an exchange with surplus.

Why this example?

Your lead magnet needs to be like that third option. Your lead magnet needs to be an exchange with surplus.

Only that.

Otherwise, don't even bother making lead magnets. Don't add more noise to the information overload that nobody actually cares about.

Step 7: Make it easy for them to tell you what else they want from you.

After the lead magnet is received and consumed, some of your potential clients will be ready to learn more about your offer — or even buy it. This is the moment to deliver a call to action. A call to action (CTA) tells the audience what to do next.

But that's not all.

At least not if you want your ads to actually work.

A good CTA contains two things:

1) what to do;

2) a reason to do it right now.

What to do: The CTA asks the audience to call a number, click a button, share information, request a callback, etc. There are too many options to list. Just know that the CTA shows your audience how to become an engaged lead. Good CTAs use clear, simple, direct language.

Not "don't delay" — but "call now."

Many people overlook this, but if you clearly and specifically tell your audience what to do next after consuming the lead magnet... If you give people a reason to take action, more people will take action.

If you don't, they'll consume it and move on. And within an hour, they'll have completely forgotten about you.

Also. Keep in mind that:

- first, good reasons work better than weak ones.

- second, any reason (even a weak one) works better than no reason at all.

So to drive more people to act, I include as many compelling reasons as possible.

Here are my favorite reasons to act right now:

a) Scarcity — when there's a limited quantity of something.

Especially when supply is lower than demand.

When something is scarce, people tend to want it more. And that makes them far more likely to act right now. The less of something there is, the more valuable it seems.

That's just how our brain works.

But there's a catch. Creating artificial scarcity is either unethical (you're lying to them) or it eats into your revenue.

So the best scarcity strategy I know is reality.

Let me explain.

If tomorrow you could close ten times as many clients as you do today, could you actually handle that? If the answer is no — that's your real limit, and your natural scarcity.

Maybe you're limited in how many clients you can serve, how much work you can take on, or how many hours you have in a week. Don't keep that a secret — use those facts in your advertising.

This creates ethical scarcity.

If you can't serve more than five new clients per week, say so. Draw attention to the natural scarcity in your business. If you have limitations, you can use them to your advantage.

Example for fitness and yoga instructors:

> "The most convenient time slots fill up fast. Call now to book the time that works for you."

Example for therapists and coaches:

> "I can only work with ten people per week, so if you want to tackle this soon, do xyz..."

b) Urgency — deadlines and time limits.

I love deadlines. Very often, a big share of all sales happens in the last day before the deadline.

Our brain says: "Why buy now? There's still time. I'll buy tomorrow... maybe." And then it doesn't.

Urgency works just as well as scarcity.

A countdown timer works incredibly well here. But it's essential that it's real — not fake. With urgency, just like with scarcity, be honest and ethical.

EXAMPLES:

> "Registration for our summer coding camp closes on May 15th at noon. The next camp runs a year from now."

> "Our back-to-school bundle — a backpack, a water bottle and a notebook set — can only be ordered until August 31st. This set won't be made again. Supplies won't last — grab yours now!"

> "Our new season clothing collection is moving fast. It came in Monday. Today is Wednesday and half of it's already gone. Get in before your size sells out."

c) Create your own reason.

A real example from a business I worked with.

A home goods store. The owner — a woman — comes up with the most creative excuses for offers every single day.

For example:

> I was freezing on my way to work this morning. So everyone who buys a thermos or a blanket from me today gets 15% off.

> Today I'm wearing a gorgeous red dress. It made my whole day. So everything in red — dishes and towels — is 18% off.

> Hot days are here. Which means it's hot deals week. The rules are simple: whatever the temperature outside is — that's your discount percentage. Come during the hottest part of the day for the maximum discount.

She ran these offers through a delivery newsletter. Within literally one week, online sales exceeded in-store sales by 50%. And within a couple of months, she shut down the physical store entirely and went 100% online.

The point?

Nobody is stopping you from making up your own reasons for offers and deadlines. Just get creative.

And furthermore.

Your reason doesn't even have to make perfect sense — it will still get more people to take action.

A critically important real-world example.

Take your average expert who runs their own blog. They have subscribers who read their content and are willing to buy their products.

This expert sells consultations through their blog. Five consultations a week. Getting a spot isn't easy — there's always a waitlist. Natural, ethical scarcity — simply because the expert can't do more without burning out.

Then this expert reads too many books about warm-up sequences and online business.

And decides to launch their own info product.

So they create the product and go all out selling it. All their existing clients and potential clients enthusiastically snap it up.

Everyone is satisfied.

You know what happens next?

The next launch will be nearly nonexistent. Because their entire audience will be satisfied. And that will immediately show up in consultation bookings — those will dry up too. By launching so hard, the expert just overfed their subscribers, and now those subscribers will drift to someone else. Because this expert is no longer interesting. Only the die-hard fans will remain.

So. You should always have constraints built into your business and natural scarcity in place. That's just how the human brain works: if there's no limit on a product or service, it becomes uninteresting and commonplace.

Use limitations. Always keep your clients a little hungry.

The Lead Magnet as Your Source of Power.

I want to make sure you fully grasp how important the lead magnet is.

First, the LM qualifies a lead. It brings in exactly the type of person who will buy from you.

Second, the LM makes the lead more loyal to you — which means they'll buy from you faster and at a higher price point.

Third, the LM is the gateway into your subscriber database. The right LM determines the quality of your list — the one you'll be working with for years(!) to come.

In practice, the LM defines the extent of your power going forward.

The Most Detailed Advertising Copy Framework for Your Outstanding Lead Magnet.

Here's the deal. There's a prevailing belief in the market that lead magnet ads should be short and punchy. The shorter, the better. That's not true.

If you want to fill your database with cheap, low-quality junk traffic, keep your ads short.

If you want a conscious, qualified audience in your database, make them detailed. The more detailed, the better.

Yes, in that case the leads will cost more — but they'll bring far more money into your business than unaware leads will. And their path to that first payment will be much shorter.

So, the most detailed advertising copy framework for selling your lead magnet:

Block 1. Offer with visual and CTA button (ideally fitting on one screen).

Block 2. What problem the LM solves.

Block 3. Description of the Unique Solution Mechanism.

Block 4. Information about the author or company.

Block 5. Step-by-step guide: what the reader needs to do to get the LM, and what happens next.

Block 6. Addressing the audience's objections.

Block 7. Bonuses (yes, even a free LM can have bonuses — and they work like a rocket).

Block 8. Call to action, again.

Block 9. Time limitation.

Block 10. What happens if the audience doesn't take the LM (missed opportunities).

The blocks can be rearranged. Some can be minimized or cut entirely. Others can be amplified with more substance.

Again — get creative!

A Few Critical Points When Working with Lead Magnets.

Point one.

Working with LMs is like being a scientist-practitioner. You take one LM, launch traffic. If it doesn't move — take another, then another, then a fifth, then a tenth. Contact! From that point, you start dialing it in...

Don't get discouraged if your first LM falls flat.

Just act like a scientist: work through your hypotheses, log the results in your lab notebook, and don't even think about getting discouraged if results don't come right away. Even the very best in the game rarely hit on the first try. You'll never know in advance what the market will love and what it won't. Sooner or later, you'll find the combination that makes you unstoppable.

Point two.

If your LM is a PDF report or a case study, make several products right away. This significantly boosts conversions.

I once worked with a traffic specialist. He wanted help working with his list. He gave me seven killer frameworks for working with different types of traffic. All designed for different lead magnets. But I pulled a clever move and combined all seven frameworks into one lead magnet...

We then tested each individual framework as its own LM. Here's what happened: the combined package of all seven gave us a cost per subscriber that was 5(!) times lower than any of them individually.

(And now, with more experience under my belt, I'd test yet another variation: offer one framework as the main hook, and give all the others as bonuses — with each bonus written up just as compellingly as the main product.)

So don't be stingy with the value you give people.

Your potential clients will have no excuse to say no. And if they do, they'll spend the next month kicking themselves and feeling like idiots...

Point three.

When you're building a lead magnet, remember: you don't want subscribers — you want clients.

For example, if you're a marketer looking for clients with real budgets, you need to create a lead magnet about A/B tests or common scaling mistakes. That kind of LM attracts exactly your target audience — people with money. It brings you clients. (Proven from personal experience.)

If instead you create an LM called "How to Set Up Ads on Social Media and Search Engines," you'll attract subscribers who will happily download your LM, thank you for it, but never pay for ad setup. They'll do it themselves.

On the other hand, that kind of LM can work perfectly for selling a course on how to run your own traffic.

Bottom line — you get it? Build an LM that solves a problem specifically for your target audience.

Point four.

Your lead magnet should lead toward the sale of your product. Not just exist for its own sake. Never forget this.

That's essentially it!

Now you know how to create a quality lead magnet. All that's left is the small matter of actually doing it!

Build your list. Work your list. Sell to your list.

That's how you achieve true power.

In my view — that's a pretty exciting prospect.

A note on prompts.

The format of this book won't allow me to share every prompt I use in my work. But here's a basic starting point to get you going. From there, treat AI like a team member who genuinely knows their marketing — but whose steps you need to direct.

Here's the prompt itself.

AI PROMPT

> I have a target audience profile. All the data is in the attached document. I want to create several lead magnets that will attract this audience. I need you to: 1. Suggest 10 ideas for such lead magnets. 2. I'll choose one, and you'll create the structure for it. 3. I'll approve or refine it, and then you'll build it out for me. Use the following material as your guide for creating lead magnets.

CHAPTER 4

4 Secrets of Traffic Generation That Will Create Conditions Where You Have More Leads Than You Can Handle... Year After Year

> A note on sources: the four ways to reach people in this chapter come from Alex Hormozi's $100M Leads. This is my take on them — with my own stories and prompts.

Let's take stock of where we are.

You've figured out what your potential clients actually want. And you've built several lead magnets around those desires.

Now the task in front of you is to drive traffic to those lead magnets.

And to do that, you need to develop the skill of creating advertising. So — what is advertising?

Advertising — the process of creating awareness — lets people who don't know you discover the products and services you sell. The more people learn about your products and services, the more you can sell.

And the more you sell, the more money you make.

With the skill of creating advertising and a steady flow of leads, it's very hard to stay broke.

Because:

- Advertising lets you have a terrible product... and still make money.

- Advertising lets you be a terrible salesperson... and still make money.

- Advertising lets you make a ton of mistakes... and still make money.

In short, having this skill gives you an unlimited number of chances to get it right.

Advertising is a skill worth having.

To start getting leads, you need to start talking about your product.

Tell the market: here I am, and here's what I've got. It solves problems like these.

There are two types of people we tell about ourselves and our product: people who know us, and people who don't.

And there are two ways to communicate with them: one to one, and one to many.

Combine those, and you get four core ways to get your message out to the market.

So here's what we've got:

Two types of audiences: warm and cold.

Two communication modes: one on one (personal), one to many (public).

A little theory to get through first.

A warm audience consists of people who have given us permission to contact them. These are our friends, family members, subscribers, current clients, past clients, phone contacts, and so on.

A cold audience consists of people who haven't given us permission to reach out. To get through to them, we'll need to buy contact lists, build contact lists, pay platforms for access, and so on.

Personal communication is when only one person receives your message. This could be a phone call, an email, or a plain old letter.

Public communication is when many people receive your message at once. This could be a social media post, a billboard, a video, or a podcast.

Combining warm and cold audiences with personal and public communication gives us exactly four ways to tell anyone about anything.

These are the only four ways you can let the market know about you and your product.

- Personal communication to a warm audience = warm outreach

- Public communication to a warm audience = content publishing

- Personal communication to a cold audience = cold outreach

- Public communication to a cold audience = paid advertising

Let's break each one down.

(Quick side note: if you already have an established business with traffic flowing fine, just think about how you can apply all of this in your situation. Don't wave it off too fast.)

#1. Warm Outreach.

This is probably the best way to get started when you have almost no budget for advertising.

It's also the most misunderstood method. Because it's the favorite tool of MLM hustlers who annoy the hell out of everyone they know.

(Although — I'll give credit where it's due — it works really well for them. Massive networks are built this way.)

And now I'm going to show you how to use this type of lead traffic to get results fast and with integrity.

But first, a story.

It was 2018.

A business I'd been running successfully for 10 years collapsed under me.

Luckily, I had already started diving deep into automated funnels and was pushing hard in that direction.

I had no time to build my own funnel. I needed money — basically by tomorrow.

What did I do?

I picked up my phone and started calling every contact I had who ran their own business and might need my services.

Here's one conversation that happened:

- Masha, hey! How are things? What's new? How are sales going? How's marketing in general?

- Hi! Things are chugging along. No marketing to speak of, but we urgently need a CRM system. Can you set it up and train our staff to use it?

- Hell yeah, Masha. Setting up CRMs and training people is literally my favorite thing.

As you can see, I didn't try to sell her an automated funnel. She had zero need for one. But she did have a problem. And I solved it.

The next day, I had twice what I needed.

Could I have spotted the client's problem that fast and offered a solution if I'd been writing social media posts or setting up ads instead of picking up the phone?

Maybe. But the point is clear: in a conversation, I found the problem and pitched the fix.

And after the CRM was set up, Masha handed me four real estate developer companies to work with full time. I built them beautiful, effective marketing campaigns.

Then more developers started coming in.

That's how I built an agency specializing in real estate developers.

As for automated funnels — I started selling those later anyway. Calmly, without the panic. Once the financial fires were put out.

Warm outreach is the fastest, simplest, and cheapest way to find people who are genuinely interested in your product.

It's incredibly effective. Yet most companies completely ignore this method of getting clients. Which is a huge mistake.

Plus, you have a warm audience right now, even if you don't realize it. Everyone knows someone. So starting with personal contacts is the natural first move.

Warm outreach typically happens through: calls, emails, SMS, voice messages, and so on.

When you're just starting out with warm outreach, you won't generate a huge volume of engaged leads. You're doing everything yourself. But that's actually the beauty of it. Every interaction is personal.

And that's exactly why it's reliable.

In a real conversation, you can always uncover the client's problem and sell them the solution using your product.

(You remember we're not selling a product — we're selling the solution to a problem, right? Right?)

How to run a warm outreach campaign in 10 steps.

Warm outreach isn't just the simplest and most effective way to land your first 5–10 clients for any new product or service.

It's also a fantastic way to test the market.

Here's how it's done:

Step 1: Build your contact list

Step 2: Choose your platform and communication tool

Step 3: Personalize your message

Step 4: Make contact

Step 5: Warm up the contact

Step 6: Bring in their friends and connections (optional)

Step 7: Make them the simplest offer in the world

Step 8: Repeat from the beginning

Step 9: Start charging money if you were working for free

Step 10: Keep your contact list warm

Step 1: Build your contact list

If you think you don't have many contacts... you're wrong. Let me prove it.

Pick up your phone. Open your address book. How many people are in there?

Now open WhatsApp, Messenger, LinkedIn — whatever you've got.

How many now?

It keeps growing.

Log into your email and check your address book. Chances are you've accumulated a solid number of contacts over the years.

And now for the good part.

Pull up your social media profiles. How many friends and followers do you have?

Now collect all those contacts into one document. A Google Sheet works great. How many did you end up with? For most readers of this book, you'll easily hit over 1,000 contacts.

Who said you don't have leads? They're right here. Sitting right in front of you. All you have to do is identify the right ones. That's what the next steps are for.

Step 2: Choose your platform and communication tool

Start with the platform where you have the most contacts. Phone, email, social media — doesn't matter. Just go where the numbers are highest, then move on to the others later.

Step 3: Personalize your message

Simple enough. You open with small talk, just like I did in the story above. By the way, I hadn't spoken to Masha in about ten years before that call.

On social media, you might kick things off like this:

- Oh hey, Mike! Great photo, man. Went on vacation? Awesome! How was it? Me, I still can't manage to get away...

The key here is just to start a conversation — not to pitch your services right out of the gate.

How many contacts should you reach out to per day?

If you want results, and fast — at least 100 per day. Nobody said this would be easy. Plan for a 1% conversion rate. So if you want 5 clients, you need to send "Hey, how's it going?" at least 500 times. Want 10 clients? Send it 1,000 times.

Step 4: Make contact

Then you start talking to all of them. Some will reply right away, some won't reply at all, some will get back to you the next day.

Your goal: get a conversation going. Just like running into an old friend.

Step 5: Warm up the contact

This is the step MLM people always skip — and it's why they blow it every time. At this step, you act like a HUMAN BEING, not a pushy peddler of shady supplements.

Listen actively, respond thoughtfully. Keep the conversation going like a normal person. Compliment what they share with you. And gradually steer the conversation toward where you want it to go.

If they ask how you're doing and what you're up to these days — that's your perfect opening to talk about yourself and your product.

Step 6: Bring in their friends and connections (optional)

At this point you can gently explore whether your product might be relevant for them — or for someone they know.

Don't push. Keep everything ethical.

Step 7: Make them the simplest offer in the world.

At this step (and the previous one), you're identifying a need, if one exists. Once you find it, offer to solve that problem.

If the need is crystal clear — like it was with Masha — go ahead and name your price. Especially if you're confident you can deliver.

If the product is new, you're not fully confident in its effectiveness yet, or the prospect is on the fence, you can go with the most powerful offer there is.

Offer to solve the problem for free. Or for money, but only after the service is delivered.

For now, just stick to this principle: "Sell the solution to the problem, not the product itself." That alone is 80% of the battle.

If your product is still rough around the edges, just say so. People aren't stupid. Be honest and keep it simple.

You could say something like:

Since I'm only taking on five people, I can give you my full attention to make sure you get outstanding results. And I'll give you all of this for free, if you promise: 1) to follow my guidance, 2) to give me feedback, and 3) to leave an honest review if you feel it deserves one. Sound fair?

This sets reasonable expectations upfront. And nobody can call your product half-baked — you told them from the start they'd be part of the pilot group.

Step 8: Repeat from the beginning

Once you've gone through all the contacts on one platform, move to the next one with the most contacts. After that, move to the third… and so on.

If you have 1,000 leads across all your platforms, that's a solid ten days of work. A full month if you count follow-up touches. By that point, I promise you, five or more people will have taken you up on your free offer. And some of them will turn into paying clients.

One month of focused effort will absolutely bring in money. No question.

And if you do great work, your new clients (if you ask them) will refer their friends — who will also become paying clients.

Simple as that.

Step 9: Start charging money if you were working for free

Once people start recommending you and your service, start charging — if you haven't been already.

When that happens, swap the word "free" in the script above for "80% off for the next five spots."

Then "60% off for the next five spots."

Then "40% off for the next five spots." And so on.

The rule "I raise my prices every five clients" also creates urgency, because the prices really do go up. And honestly, I'd recommend never stopping the price-raising process. Don't be shy — keep bumping the price by 20% every 5 clients until you hit your ceiling.

This is your business. Your rules. Raising your prices as you gain experience is the right call.

Step 10: Keep your contact list warm.

Imagine you've worked through your entire contact list.

Anyone else would abandon it — but not you. You're smart, so you'll keep nurturing those relationships. And you'll take personal outreach to the next level: invite your contacts to follow your Facebook page or other social media. Or better yet, subscribe to your email list.

You're running an email list and writing to it every day, right?

No?

Then today is the day to start. And I'll show you exactly how to write killer emails that actually sell — that's coming in one of the next chapters.

Track your results.

Otherwise you can't evaluate your work.

With warm outreach, roughly one in five contacts should respond. That's the global average. Your numbers probably won't be too far off.

So out of every 100 people you reach out to, expect around 20 replies.

Of those 20, roughly one in five will take you up on your free offer. That's 4 people.

Of those four, if you've done everything right, at least one will want to become a paying client.

This formula lets you predict how many clients you'll get per 100 warm outreach attempts.

The exact numbers depend on how strong your offer is and how much trust you've built. But regardless, if you're persistent enough, you will get a client and money in the bank. And the more you do it, the better your numbers and conversion rates become.

Yes, it takes effort.

But through this process, you'll gain so much more. You'll get to know your audience and their pain points really well. Which means you'll be able to craft a killer offer.

And a killer offer = a lot of money.

How does that sound?

So this approach is genuinely great. The key is to do it right — not like those MLM characters who make everyone cringe.

Warm outreach has two limitations.

The first is time.

When you're just starting out, finding new clients will eat up a lot of your day. Seriously — a lot. You need to spend a minimum of 4 hours on it per day. It should be the very first thing you do when your workday starts.

Don't stop until you've hit your daily goal.

The second limitation is the size of your network.

At some point, you'll run out of "people you know."

Don't worry. Just move on to the next traffic source.

#2. Publishing Free Content.

Warm outreach doesn't generate a massive volume of leads relative to the time it takes.

If we want to reach ten people, we have to repeat our actions ten times. Want to reach 100 people? Do it 100 times.

It's not easy.

By publishing free content on your communication channels, you can say something once and reach ten, a hundred, or a thousand people at the same time. So free content lets you generate far more engaged leads for the same amount of time invested.

And that's one more reason to learn how to create content that's genuinely interesting and engaging.

People who find your content valuable become part of your warm audience. And if they think the information would be useful to others, they'll share it. And if those people like it too, they'll become part of your warm audience as well.

Pretty great, right?

Sharing can go on indefinitely.

The more people share your content, the larger your warm audience grows.

And every now and then, you'll make them an offer. The exact offers you refined through one-on-one conversations in the first phase. And if you do it right, your offer will deliver enough value to your clients — enough that they'll be willing to pay for it.

And the bigger your audience, the more money you'll make.

Consistently publishing free content means you'll have a constantly growing audience of people who are far more likely to buy from you.

On top of that, free content makes all your other advertising more effective. Remember the Customer Journey? The attraction and engagement phases? That's exactly what this is about.

The free content phase can multiply your flow of leads and clients by ten.

But publishing free content isn't all sunshine, rainbows, and fluffy marshmallows.

There's a flip side.

First, personalization is harder. So fewer people respond. Or more accurately — conversion rates drop. They're nowhere near the 1-in-100 you see with warm outreach. Much lower. But that downside is more than offset by volume, if you do it right.

Second, you're now competing with every other content creator out there. Standing out is harder.

Third, if you do manage to stand out, people will start copying you. If you haven't infused your own personality into your content, that'll hurt. It also means you'll constantly need to be innovating.

Fourth, a bigger audience means more clients. More clients means more money. More money means more happiness. But what do you even do with all that happiness?

Just kidding — it doesn't quite work that way. Happiness might not multiply, but the money definitely will.

And that's a good thing.

Alright.

Content that attracts clients with money.

One more reminder.

There's a strategic marketing principle called the Customer Journey. (I've mentioned it more than once already. You can feel how important it is, right?)

The idea is simple.

You don't propose on a first date. The seller-buyer relationship works the same way.

First, interested glances → First conversation → First invitation out → First dinner together → Then, eventually, a proposal.

Same thing in business.

Grabbing attention with content (or ads) → Engagement (warming up with content) → Sale

And here's one VERY IMPORTANT POINT that's absolutely critical for successful sales.

At the engagement stage, infotainment content works best.

This type of content entertains a little, teaches a little, and always sells.

This approach works best for holding attention and driving sales.

But at the attraction stage, this type of content doesn't perform as well.

For attracting attention, educational content outperforms entertainment.

Because educational content is what hooks the right potential client — the one who will eventually put money in your pocket.

When we publish educational content, we attract readers who HAVE A PROBLEM and want to solve it. That's why they're looking for VALUABLE content — not ENTERTAINMENT.

See the catch?

If you try to attract people with entertainment content, you'll end up with cheap followers who probably won't buy anything. Because nothing's hurting them. They're just bored. They're looking for a good time.

And there you are.

So.

First, educate to attract the right subscribers. Then entertain and teach a little. And then sell. Can't skip the selling part.

The three components of a content unit.

Just remember this.

Content whose job is to grow your audience does one thing — it rewards people for consuming it.

A person is rewarded by content when:

1) there's a reason to consume it (the person wants to solve a problem or accomplish something);
2) they give it enough attention (content that people spend time on automatically becomes valuable);
3) they feel satisfied by that reason (the reader should walk away knowing something useful for their goals).

Fortunately, we can turn these three points into three things we need to do when creating content for audience growth.

In short, it means we must:

1. Hook the attention: make them notice our content.
2. Hold the attention: make them read or watch all the way through.
3. Reward the attention: satisfy the reason they started consuming it in the first place.

The minimum amount of material needed to hook, hold, and reward attention — that's your content unit.

Let's look at each element of a content unit.

1) The Hook (grab attention)

Nothing works if you don't grab the reader's attention from the very first moment. So the hook is absolutely critical.

A hook can be an image or a headline.

I won't go deep on images here — I'm more of a text person. The only thing I'll say: pay attention to your competitors and to anything that catches your own eye. If something grabs you, it'll likely grab your target audience too.

The image's job: stop the scroll and direct attention to the headline.

Now let's talk a bit more about the headline.

Remember, with this content we want to attract an engaged audience — one we can eventually sell our product to.

These are people who have a problem and are looking for a solution. So logically, your headline should signal that you have the answer.

Here are some examples:

1. “Can’t lose weight? Discover how these 5 exercises help you drop pounds in 30 days!”
2. “Tired of living paycheck to paycheck? Discover 7 simple steps to financial freedom!”
3. “Plagued by constant headaches? Get rid of migraines for good with these natural remedies!”
4. “Struggling with clutter at home? Discover how these 10 ideas will transform your space and your life!”
5. “Stuck in the same place? Discover strategies for climbing the career ladder!”
6. “No idea what to wear? This style guide will help you build the perfect wardrobe!”
7. “Feeling distant in your relationship? Find 5 ways to reignite the passion and connection!”
8. “Running low on motivation? Here’s how these habits will change your whole approach to life!”
9. “Tired of the same old vacations? Discover unique destinations worth adding to your bucket list!”
10. “Kids glued to their screens? Find out how to get them excited about active play!”

I’m sure you’ve got the idea and can write killer headlines on your own.

2) Hold their attention.

No need to reinvent the wheel here. Everything’s already been figured out.

There are three main ways to hold attention. Lists, step-by-step guides, and stories.

Let me jump straight to examples — no need for a long explanation.

LISTS.

1. “10 Best Cardio Exercises for Burning Fat”
2. “100 Personal Finance Mistakes and How to Avoid Them”
3. “12 Foods That Improve Gut Health”
4. “10 Budget-Friendly Ways to Refresh Your Apartment’s Look”
5. “7 Habits of Successful Managers Worth Adopting”
6. “10 Trendy Accessories That Elevate Any Outfit”
7. “15 Ways to Show Love Without Words”
8. “10 Books That Will Change the Way You See the World”
9. “40 Exotic Travel Destinations You Probably Haven’t Heard Of”
10. “10 Creative Ideas for Educational Activities with Kids”

Seriously — if you don’t know what to write about, use lists. They never miss.

STEP-BY-STEP GUIDES.

1. “How to Start Practicing Yoga: A Step-by-Step Guide for Beginners”
2. “How to Build and Stick to a Personal Budget: A Step-by-Step Plan”
3. “How to Make the Perfect Green Smoothie: A Step-by-Step Recipe with Tips”
4. “How to Build a Stylish Bookshelf Yourself: A Step-by-Step Guide”
5. “How to Nail a Job Interview: Step-by-Step Tips”
6. “How to Build a Capsule Wardrobe: A Step-by-Step Guide for Beginners”
7. “How to Avoid Conflict in Relationships: A Step-by-Step Guide to Harmony”
8. “How to Start Meditating: A Step-by-Step Guide for Beginners”
9. “How to Plan the Perfect Trip: A Step-by-Step Guide”
10. “How to Prepare Your Child for Their First Day of School: A Step-by-Step Guide for Parents”

Step-by-step guides are the perfect format for showing that you know your stuff and can be trusted. So don’t hold back — use this content type as much as you want.

STORIES.

1. “How I Overcame My Insecurities and Learned to Love Working Out: A Journey to Myself”
2. “My Road to Financial Independence: From Debt to Investments”
3. “My Struggle with Extra Weight: A Story of Transformation and Habit Change”
4. “How We Turned an Old Country House into a Cozy Retreat: Our Renovation Story”
5. “How I Went from Assistant to Department Head: A Career Growth Story”
6. “How I Found My Unique Style: A Story of Discovery and Experimentation”
7. “Our Journey to a Happy Marriage: A 10-Year Love Story”
8. “How Reading Books Changed My Life: A Personal Growth Story”
9. “My Year of Traveling the World: How I Finally Took the Leap”
10. “How Becoming a Mother Changed Me: A Story of Parenthood and Self-Discovery”

Stories are my personal favorite.

But there’s one thing to keep in mind. Don’t tell stories about what you had for lunch. That kind of content works great for people who already know you well — but it doesn’t work for a cold audience.

Use stories that share your experience. Experience that’s genuinely useful to your potential buyers.

Remember — we’re not just trying to attract. We’re trying to attract in order to sell. Not to collect likes.

3) Reward them. Let’s say you came up with great hooks and organized killer content using lists, steps, or stories.

But the key question is: is that content actually good for the reader?

Does it satisfy the reason people started watching or reading it in the first place? Does it make them want to share it with their friends?

How good your content is depends entirely on how often it rewards your audience for the time they spent consuming it.

EXAMPLE:

You write a post titled “Can’t Lose Weight? Discover How These 5 Exercises Help You Drop Pounds in 30 Days!”

And then all five exercises are complete garbage — obvious, generic filler. In that case, there’s zero reward. Nobody will consider that content worth anything. Nobody will share it.

Another example.

If your post promises: “5 Marketing Strategies to Help a Freelancer Get Clients on Autopilot” — and those strategies are genuinely solid, but freelancers can’t actually use them because they’re too complex...

...they will not share that content, and they won’t be back for more.

Rewarding your audience means meeting or exceeding their expectations when they choose to engage with your content.

Test, keep at it, and don’t give up if it doesn’t click right away.

One more piece of advice.

Create all your content for strangers.

If you want to grow your warm audience, create content as if the people consuming it have never heard of you before.

If you make content for strangers, strangers will like it — because you made it for them. And they’ll share it. So your audience will grow much faster.

Don’t litter your content with inside jokes that only your longtime followers get.

Those jokes have a place — in your email list — but not in content meant for attracting new people.

Create content as if the person consuming it has never heard of you before. And the people who already know you won't mind. They'll appreciate the refresher.

Once you figure out how to make a solid content unit, all you have to do is make more of them.

That's the only way your audience will grow. And when your audience gets big enough, you'll probably want to monetize it. Otherwise, what's the point of all this?

A note on using AI for this kind of content. Honestly, it's a grey area. Here's how I put it: I use AI to create this type of content, but only as a thinking tool — something to bounce ideas off.

You can start like this:

>
> You are a world-class expert with 20 years of experience in creating engaging content. Your task is to suggest topics for that kind of content for me. I'm attaching a document with a detailed description of my target audience. Analyze it carefully and suggest 20 content topics.
> [Attach your target audience document]

Next, pick whatever appeals to you and ask it to come up with a headline for that topic.

> AI PROMPT
> Thank you. I like topic #XX. Using the examples and instructions below, come up with 10 headline variations for it.
> [INSERT THE TEXT OF THE "HOOK (GRAB ATTENTION)" SECTION]

Pick the headline you like and ask it to sketch out the key ideas and structure for the post.

Then:

> AI PROMPT

> You're still a world-class expert in creating engaging content. Write a post using this structure [your structure]. Preserve the tone and authorial voice. What I gave you is the skeleton. Your job is to put flesh on it. Write with depth, richness, and add some real thinking.

Whatever comes out of that — polish it by hand. Add your own opinions and experience. That way you'll end up with a genuinely solid content unit that doesn't feel plastic.

#3. Cold Outreach.

I have a lot of respect for this method. It actually works even better in B2B than in B2C.

In this chapter, we're focusing on one-on-one personal outreach to a cold audience. It's worth noting that cold outreach is built on the same foundation as warm outreach — think of it as the more advanced version, no longer limited by the size of your warm audience.

You knock on 100 doors. You make 100 phone calls. You send 100 messages on social media. All of that is cold outreach — and it has made companies billions.

It worked 100 years ago. It works today. And when the platforms change, it will still work tomorrow.

But cold outreach has one key difference: trust.

Or rather — the complete absence of it.

Strangers don't trust you.

And compared to people who already know you, strangers create three new problems.

First, you have no way to simply reach out and contact them.

Second, even if you do manage to reach them, they'll expertly ignore you.

Third, even if they do pay attention, they're not interested.

Here's what these problems look like in the real world.

If you plan to go door to door, your first obstacle is finding the addresses of people who might be potential clients. If you do find those addresses, they won't open the door when you knock. And if they do open it, they'll tell you to get lost.

If you plan to make cold calls, you don't have the right numbers. And if you do, people don't pick up. And if they pick up, they hang up immediately.

If you plan to send cold emails, first you won't have the right email addresses. Even if you do, people won't open the email. And if they open it, they won't reply.

As you can see, there are a lot of obstacles.

And that's wonderful.

Why?

Because nobody likes obstacles. Which means you'll have almost no competition here. The only thing left is to figure out how to overcome them.

Here's how:

1) Find a way to contact your potential clients

2) Figure out what to say

3) Keep reaching out until they're ready to listen

In other words, we simply need to find more ways to connect with the most qualified strangers. Reach out to them multiple times with different offers until they show enough interest to engage in a real conversation.

Cold outreach is a numbers game. The more people you call / visit / message, the more leads you'll get.

Since we're dealing with three new problems, I've split this chapter into three steps — one for each problem.

— First, we build a targeted lead list.

— Then we figure out what to say to get a response.

— Third, we compensate for the low response rate by increasing the volume and variety of our outreach attempts.

Problem #1: “How do I reach them?” → Build a list

Unlike any other form of advertising, cold outreach lets us be as specific as we want.

Want to reach only doctors who have taken advanced training courses in the past year? Easy.

Need young mothers with one-year-old kids? No problem.

Want to message IT company directors with annual revenue of $1 billion? Absolutely doable.

Building targeted lists today is actually pretty straightforward. There are three main ways to do it.

Option 1: Software. There are tons of options online — something for every need. The vast majority are scrapers, and there’s a specific one for each platform. Just type it into a search engine and you’ll find everything you need, including how to use them.

Option 2: Brokers. There are people who specialize in compiling these databases and selling them. Working with them is often the best move. They’ll give you the highest-quality list for any request you throw at them — even the most niche ones. And yes, they definitely exist in the market, even if you’ve never heard of them. They just don’t advertise themselves. They have more than enough clients as it is.

Option 3: Manual search. For example, you can find people on job boards who are looking to hire marketers. Instant hot leads who need marketing services. Join groups and communities where you believe your potential buyers hang out, and look for their contact details there.

One very important thing.

If you build the list yourself, the chances that those people have already been contacted are minimal. When you work with brokers, you get a high-quality list fast — but there will be competition. Build it yourself and you get a less refined list that takes longer to compile — but zero competition.

Problem #2: "I have a list — but what do I say to them?" → Personalize and deliver big, fast value

Do you know what separates spam from an offer people actually notice?

Exactly.

PERSONALIZATION.

To attract more leads, your message needs to feel like it's coming from someone they know. The best way to achieve that is to actually know something about the person you're trying to contact. Essentially, you need your cold touch to feel like a warm touch.

...Imagine your phone rings from an unknown number. Would you pick up? Probably not — especially if the number is from some random country. But if it's from your region? Slightly more likely. Why? Because it might be someone you know. To take that idea further — imagine you do pick up...

...The person says your name, then pauses (like a normal human being).

You'd say: "Yeah... who is this?" Now, if the person says: "This is Alex," then pauses. "I watched a few of your videos and read your recent blog post about dog training. It was amazing — genuinely helped me with my own dogs. That treat trick of yours really worked. Thank you for that."

You'd still be wondering, "What's going on here exactly?"

But you know what you wouldn't do?

Hang up.

Then you'd hear: "Oh, sorry — I'm getting ahead of myself. I work for a company that helps dog trainers market their online courses. We love working with the best in the field, so I'm always on the lookout. We've worked with other experts — Jane Miller and Tom Becker. Have you heard of them?"

You'd say yes or no (doesn't matter), and they'd continue: "Yeah, we got them a thousand course sales in 30 days using our system. I see you also sell your services — is that right?"

To which you'd most likely say yes.

Then they'd say: "Oh, that's great. We could use that same course-selling framework for you. If you ended up with a bunch of new high-ticket dog training clients, would you be upset about that?"

You'd laugh.

"Perfect. I can walk you through all the details today. Would sometime between four and five work for you?"

And you'd say: "Sure!" or something along those lines.

The thing is — if that person had opened with "Hey buddy, want to buy some marketing services?", you'd have hung up immediately.

Personalization is what gets your foot in the door and gets you the sale.

Find more information about your potential client, put it to use. Ideally, add a note about how it helped you personally.

People like people who like them.

Even if someone doesn't know you, they'll give you more of their time if you clearly know something about them.

This works great for phone calls, personalized email subject lines, and opening messages in any chat.

Even if the person doesn't know you, they'll subconsciously appreciate the time you invested in learning about them before reaching out. Those small extra efforts pay off in a big way.

Just do a little research on each lead before you message them. You can do it yourself, pay someone to do it for you, or use software. Figure out where to start so you come across as familiar to your leads.

Moving on.

The key difference between people who know you and strangers is that... strangers give you far less time to prove your value.

They need far more reasons to come over to your side. We're not trying to "tickle" their interest — we're trying to blow their minds in under thirty seconds.

Just like with warm outreach, you can make a direct offer, offer a lead magnet, or both.

This gives the person a solid reason to respond.

I deliberately call it "big, fast value" rather than "your lead magnet" — to remind you that it needs to be BIG, FAST VALUE.

If it's weak, or the material is mediocre, you'll blend into the ocean of people competing for their attention.

And they'll treat you accordingly — they'll ignore you.

If your offer or lead magnet isn't working, raise the stakes.

Keep offering more until your offer is so good they'd feel stupid saying no. They'll either buy from you or say something great about you to someone else.

If you forget everything I said in this chapter — remember just one thing: the goal is to demonstrate the highest possible value as fast as possible.

Give away for free something people normally pay for, and they'll want it.

Note: I didn't say "something good enough to charge for." I said "something people normally pay for."

Big difference.

MAJOR POSTSCRIPT!

You know what they say — practice makes perfect.

Here's the thing: by going through all the steps above, you're not just making sales in the moment.

ALL the information you gather will give you a 10x boost in effectiveness when you launch targeting or traffic to your blog or Lead Magnet.

You simply won't have a way to "burn" your money.

Because you'll have a massive pool of valuable insights that (proven track record) hit the right audience.

And actually drive sales.

Pretty sweet, right?

Problem #3: "I don't have enough attempts to tell people about my amazing stuff — what do I do?" → Volume

This isn't even really a problem. It's just statistics. You simply make as many attempts as possible. With each attempt, you analyze the rejections and responses and use that to sharpen your offer.

And that's how you end up with a killer offer that converts more and more often.

Just. Need. To. Do. A LOT. Of. Actions.

Most people drastically underestimate the volume required for cold outreach. They also underestimate how much time it takes. But there are...

Six massive advantages to using cold outreach:

1) You don't need to create a lot of content or buy advertising. You focus on one perfectly crafted message and broadcast it to all your leads. Your only goal is to make that message better every day. There's no "audience fatigue" or "banner blindness." So you don't need to be a marketing genius to succeed — you just need to work hard.

2) Your competitors won't know what you're doing. That alone is priceless. Your system is invisible to others, which means nobody can copy it. You don't need to constantly reinvent yourself. It can run for years.
3) It's incredibly reliable. Want more results? Just do more. It works like clockwork, delivering a steady stream of new leads. Eventually, you'll arrive at an equation: for every X people you contact, you get Y clients. Then you just focus on growing X.
4) Less platform dependency. Personal outreach is rarely affected by platform changes. Public platforms tweak their rules and algorithms every day — staying effective means constantly keeping up. Cold calling, door knocking, and cold emailing, on the other hand, have barely changed in the last hundred years.
5) Compliance is less of a headache. Social media platforms banning before-and-after ads? Can't do this, can't do that? With cold outreach — you can do almost anything. Take full advantage of that freedom.
6) Hard to replicate. Even if someone wanted to copy your entire cold outreach system, they'd have to learn each step from scratch — and most of those steps are invisible. They don't know how you build your lists. They don't know how you personalize your messages. They don't know what software you use to send them. And so on.

And if those six advantages still aren't enough for you... honestly, I don't know what else I can offer.

How to use AI for this kind of work.

There are no universal prompts here. But I want to give you a workflow that will make your life significantly easier.

Iteration 1.

> AI PROMPT
> Step into the role of a cold outreach sales specialist with 20 years of experience and a strong track record. I need to write a script for a cold call (or cold email). I'm attaching a document with a detailed description of my target audience. The goal of this outreach is to sell [describe your product or service]. Suggest a call structure and an offer I can make. Use these instructions as your guide going forward.

[Paste the full text of section #3 Cold Outreach.]

Ask me as many questions as you need to do this work at the highest possible quality.

Attach your target audience analysis document.

Refine the structure and offer as you see fit, then get to work.

After making a few calls, transcribe them and use the transcripts in the next iteration. Either continue in the same chat thread or start a new one — but if you start fresh, give full context about everything done so far.

Iteration 2.

AI PROMPT

I made several calls using the structure you suggested and the offer we developed together. Here are the results: [describe in detail: how many times you got rejected, how many times your offer was accepted, etc.]. I'm attaching the transcripts of the conversations.

[Call transcripts.]

I need you to carefully analyze the calls and help me build a stronger pitch and improve the conversation structure.

Before you respond, ask me as many questions as you need to do this job at the highest possible quality.

Then adapt as the situation demands.

If objections come up that you can't handle: drop them into the current chat thread and ask the AI to help you work through them.

Sometimes AI will start getting lazy and give generic answers. Or hallucinate. When that happens, call it out and ask for a revision.

Repeat iteration 2 as many times as needed until your offer is as polished as possible.

#4. Running Ads

A bit of theory and some core principles that most people never think about.

Paid advertising is a way to reach a cold audience using a one-to-many approach. People who don't know you. Paid advertising works by paying another person or company to put your offer in front of their audience.

And since you don't need to spend time building an audience yourself, paid advertising is the fastest way to get your message in front of the greatest number of people.

In essence, you're trading money for reach.

That's a significant advantage — if you know what you're doing: meaning you know what offer to run and to which target audience.

Done right, paid advertising can bring you more potential clients than any other method. In principle, if you spend enough money, you can get every person in the world to see your ad.

And if every person in the world sees your ad, someone will buy. Even by accident (ha). So the question isn't "does advertising work?" — the question is "how well can you make it work?"

In other words, it comes down to the ratio between what you spend and what people pay you.

Just like with cold outreach, paid ads reach colder audiences with lower trust levels. So even a great offer will get a smaller response rate.

Just like with cold outreach, paid advertising overcomes that obstacle by getting your offer in front of a larger number of people.

And if an ad isn't profitable, it's usually because either the right people didn't see it — or your offer is just bad. So for advertising to be profitable, you need both: a great offer and the right people seeing it.

That's the only way to maintain ad performance over time.

Next, let's talk about how I create more effective paid ads.

First, I choose the platform where my ideal audience actually lives.

Second, I use every targeting method the platform offers to find them.

Third, I write my ad in a way that filters out everyone else.

And finally, I tell the people who are left to take the next step.

People overcomplicate this.

But that's really all there is to it.

All we're doing is narrowing down who sees our ad so we have the best possible chance of getting a response from exactly the people we need.

Once we place our ad in a "small pond" of an audience, we gradually expand to a bigger pond, then a lake, then an ocean. As the audience grows, more irrelevant people show up — but so do more of the right ones. So ad efficiency drops, but by that point, we can afford it.

In other words, the ratio of what you spend to what you earn decreases — but the total amount of money you make goes up.

Paid advertising presents four new problems we need to solve.

1) Knowing where to advertise

2) Reaching the right audience

3) Writing the best possible ad for that audience to see

4) Getting permission to continue communicating with them

Step 1: "But where should I advertise?" → Find the platform where your target audience hangs out.

Pretty obvious, right?

Come on, really?

Okay, in short: if you want to become a great entrepreneur, you need to study every platform available to you.

Here's what I look for in a platform before I advertise on it:

- I've used it myself and gotten value out of it as a consumer. So I have some sense of how it works.
- I can target people on the platform who are interested in my product.
- I know what format to package my ads in, specific to that platform.
- I have the minimum budget required to run an ad.

...And yes, platforms change all the time — but these principles stay the same.

Start with one platform that checks all four boxes. Then actively start watching, listening to, or reading the ads on it — that's your first step toward learning how to launch there.

Find a non-obvious platform — and you'll make a lot of money very quickly.

Do your research.

Take 10 of your past clients.

What are they subscribed to?

Maybe... 8 out of 10 read fishing channels or magazines.

Boom.

And for pennies, you'll get dozens of leads for a service worth tens or hundreds of thousands — maybe even millions.

(Your competitors never figured out you could even buy ads there.)

That kind of guerrilla marketing is the first thing you should try when your advertising budget is tight.

Here's the point — you're not required to advertise on mainstream platforms. On those, you'll be fighting for your potential client's attention not just against competitors, but against every single advertiser out there.

Step #2: "But how do I make sure the right people see it?" → Target them

Today's advertising platform algorithms make this step incredibly simple.

Back in the day, you had to configure a mountain of different audience settings. Then spend a month experimenting. Now it's straightforward: launch your ad, and the platform's algorithm will find your target audience for you.

Step #3: "But what should my ad actually say?" → Grab Attention + Value + Call to Action (CTA)

We covered "grab attention" in detail in the chapter on lead magnets.

So I'll keep this short.

1) Grab attention — I need to make them notice my ad.

2) Value — I need to get them interested in what I have to offer.

3) Call to action — I need to tell them what to do next.

You can actually use the same framework I laid out in the free content section. Just add your offer.

One more thing.

If you want to sell your product cold and direct from the start — that will cost you significantly more than advertising a lead magnet and walking the potential client toward a purchase step by step. The latter is much cheaper.

It all depends on your market and your budget.

Step #4: "How do I get their information?" → Get permission to contact them

Ideally, your ad should drive traffic to a landing page. That's my favorite, tried-and-true approach.

Don't overthink it. Simpler is better.

And make sure those landing pages are congruent with your ads.

People click on ads because you promised them some kind of benefit. So carry the same imagery and language onto your landing page. Make sure the promise in your ad has a natural continuation on the landing page.

Sounds obvious, but a lot of people forget this and burn through their budget.

You need continuity from the click all the way to the close.

People love consistency. Don't let them down.

And let's stop there — because you could write three thousand more pages on paid advertising and still not cover everything.

The main thing is: I've given you the principles and shown you that paid advertising is actually simple. It always works. The only question is how effective it is. And that's what you need to keep working on — constantly improving that effectiveness.

And on that note, let's wrap up this chapter.

All that's left is for you to go apply everything I've shared here.

An AI prompt for this work. You can work with it all at once, or break it into stages. Breaking it into stages gives better results. Use deep research mode.

> You are a professional marketer and creative director with 10 years of experience building profitable advertising campaigns. Your specialty is developing paid ads that work on cold audiences — quickly generating interest and converting views into leads and sales. You are an expert in targeting, advertising psychology, and offer structure. You've created ad copy and campaigns that delivered up to 10x ROI across different niches — from info products to e-commerce. Your superpower is turning even simple offers into high-impact ad messages that hit their target audience perfectly.

I'm attaching a document with a full description of my target audience.

Use that data to create an ad message (or a series of ads), strictly following the principles from my book:

1. Based on the target audience document, identify the key insights and pain points the ad must speak to.
2. Determine the best platform to advertise on (Instagram, YouTube, Facebook, LinkedIn, TikTok, etc.) based on where the target audience actually lives.
3. Write the ad copy using the formula:

- Hook (Grab Attention)
- Value
- Call to Action (CTA)

4. Make sure the ad is logically connected — from the promise in the copy to the page the click leads to (offer congruence).
5. Create one primary version and two additional (test) versions for A/B testing.
6. Add brief visual recommendations (background, colors, type of image or video, emotional tone).
7. Provide targeting recommendations: interests, behaviors, keywords, demographics.
8. Formulate the concept for a landing page or lead magnet, if direct sales aren't the right move. [or provide a description of an already-developed lead magnet]
9. At the end — give a summary of how to scale the campaign and boost its performance as the budget and reach grow.

Deliver the output as a clear structure:

1. Brief summary of insights from the target audience document
2. Platform selection and rationale
3. Main ad copy (Hook + Value + CTA)
4. A/B test variations (two additional copy options)
5. Visual recommendations
6. Targeting settings
7. Landing page concept

8. Campaign scaling recommendations

Write professionally, inspiringly, and with confidence. The tone — like a seasoned marketer sharing practical insights, not theory. Use vivid, energetic, motivating language that makes you want to implement everything right away.

Before you begin the task, ask me step-by-step as many questions as you need to complete it 100%.

CHAPTER 5

The Attractive Character

> A note on sources: the Attractive Character comes from Russell Brunson's DotCom Secrets. Here's how I use it.

So.

You've written out your Ideal Customer profile.

You've done a deep analysis of your market and your competitors. You've plumbed the depths of the soul and uncovered all the secret desires of your potential clients.

Based on that data, you've created several lead magnets. You drove traffic to them, tested, and found the most effective one.

Your subscriber base has started to grow.

Subscribers you've attracted. But now you need to pull them into your world. The world of your personality, your product, your business.

And here's the key thing.

When we start sending out emails to our list, there's no need to be exactly who you are in real life. You can create any character you want and write as that character.

If you're naturally shy, you can be bold in your emails. In your emails, you choose which sides of your life to show and which to keep behind the curtain.

Personally, I never write about my kids or my family in my emails. I think that should stay off-camera for readers. Or rather — I might mention in passing that I have kids and I'm a father of many, but nothing more than that. I can share thoughts on parenting, but about my kids themselves? No. That's a hard limit.

In short, you have the right to invent your own attractive character for your emails. The main thing is that it's believable.

Now let me reveal another one of my secrets...

How to lock readers' attention onto you and your content and how to "make" them buy your products at above-market prices, simply because they come from you.

People buy from people. People love watching people. That's why you and your business need an Attractive Character.

An Attractive Character isn't someone with model looks. Although, sure, that can be part of it too.

What I'm talking about is a persona that attracts clients and helps build a following. So that, in the end, you make sales.

Here's an example.

Picture two math tutors in the same town. Same rates, same hours, same stacks of worksheets.

The first one's flyer says: "Experienced math tutor. All grades. Proven results."

The second one's flyer says: "I failed algebra twice in high school. Then one teacher showed me it wasn't about being 'a math person' — it was about how the lessons were built. Now I teach kids the way I wish I'd been taught."

Which one do the parents of a struggling kid call first?

The second tutor has an Attractive Character. Parents of a kid who "just isn't a math person" see their child in his story — and they want what happened to him to happen to their kid.

This example is made up. But you've probably met a tutor or a coach just like him.

The beauty of the Attractive Character is that you don't need a dramatic story to create one. You can build your AC from yourself — your actual self. And it's really not as hard as it might seem.

There are just three components to creating an Attractive Character:

- 4 AC elements
- the AC's personality
- the AC's storylines.

Let's break down each of these components.

The 4 Elements of the Attractive Character

Element #1. Backstory.

Every great AC needs a backstory. This is crucial if you want results. Imagine you saw our second tutor in a short video, just explaining fractions. What would your reaction be?

You'd probably think something like: "Another tutor." Without knowing his backstory, you wouldn't bother watching. You'd just scroll past the video.

But if you first hear that he failed algebra twice — and that kids who were failing now pass his class — that's a completely different story. You might think: my kid is just like him. If he figured it out, maybe my kid can too.

See the difference?

You share your backstory so people can see where you came from. If they can understand where you started, they'll want to follow you to where you are now. If they see that you were once in a situation similar to theirs, they'll instantly identify with you and follow you.

Your story is the hook that catches your audience. Then you can lay out the Path, and they'll want to walk it.

The point is that the story has to connect somehow to the product you're selling. If you're selling a weight-loss product — talk about your weight-loss backstory. If you're selling investment advice — you need a financial backstory.

If you don't have a backstory that connects to your product, that's fine. You can use someone else's — for example, take your clients' case studies and build a backstory for your product or business.

Your AC doesn't have to be you, but a backstory is absolutely essential.

Element #2. The Attractive Character Speaks in Parables.

By parables, I mean short stories that are easy to remember and carry important meaning.

If you read my posts, you'll see that every post I write is a parable that reveals some important idea I want to get across to the reader — an idea that will ultimately lead them toward a purchase.

Element #3. The Attractive Character Shares Their Flaws.

This element of AC creation is one of the most important. Because it makes your character real. You need to understand that every believable AC has flaws.

Think about your favorite characters in movies, books, or TV shows. Every character you're emotionally connected to has flaws, right? One of the most famous examples is Superman. He's the ultimate fusion of goodness, valor, steel, and invincibility.

As a storyline, that's boring. But when kryptonite shows up and his concern for his family's wellbeing enters the picture, suddenly he has vulnerabilities and flaws. He becomes an interesting character.

Nobody wants to hear about a perfect person, because perfect people don't exist in the real world. If someone's trying to seem perfect — something's off about them.

And yet, most experts try to build a perfect facade for their audience, and in doing so they push away the real people they're trying to attract.

Conversely, the moment your audience learns you're not perfect — that you have character flaws — they'll start to empathize with you. They'll like you more, because you're like them. You're just like them — imperfect.

Element #4. The Attractive Character Uses the Power of Polarity.

Another problem people run into when communicating with their audience is trying not to offend anyone.

Instead of being a person with a point of view, experts turn into "spineless jellyfish" in the eyes of their readers, sharing only the thoughts and ideas that won't ruffle any feathers.

Being neutral is boring.

When an AC tries to win everyone's heart, they end up alone.

On the contrary, Attractive Characters tend to be highly polarizing. They share their opinions on tough issues and hold their ground — no matter how many people disagree with them.

And when they stand up for what they believe in, they divide the audience into three camps: those who agree with them, those who are neutral, and those who don't agree.

When you start creating this polarization, it turns your readers into die-hard fans who will follow what you say, share your messages, and buy from you again and again.

The Attractive Character's Personality.

Every AC typically has one of four personality types.

Read the description of each and choose the one that fits you best.

By understanding what type of personality your AC has, you'll be able to build the right relationship with your audience.

The Leader.

The Leader personality is typically adopted by people whose goal is to guide their audience from a dark past into a bright future.

Most Leaders have the same backstory as their audience. They walked this path first. They made all the mistakes, took all the hits, and found the route. Now their audience comes to them for help — to walk that path faster, safer, more effectively.

You know what makes a true leader powerful? Not that they're perfect. But that they're already on the other side — where their audience wants to be. They've proven the path is real. That creates a powerful bond — a bond of trust.

I'm sure there are leaders you follow in various areas of your life. A coach, a mentor, a blogger, or a writer. Look closer — what do they all have in common? They're all already where you want to be. And if you think about it — maybe in your own niche, you've already gone further than your audience. Which means the Leader role might be the most natural fit for you.

The Adventurer.

The Adventurer is someone who's incredibly curious, but doesn't always know the answers upfront. So they set out on a journey to discover the ultimate truth for themselves and for others.

They bring back treasures from their travels and share them with their audience. "Look what I found! Let's figure out together what to do with it."

This personality is very similar to the Leader, but there's a key difference. The Leader has already walked the path and knows the route. They guide people down a proven road. The Adventurer explores new territory alongside their audience. They don't say "follow me, I know the way." They say "let's go there together and see what's there."

The Adventurer creates a sense of shared discovery. Their audience isn't followers — they're partners. They walk side by side, not behind.

And that makes the connection with them even stronger, because they feel like part of the adventure, not just spectators.

The Reporter.

This personality type is often used by people who haven't yet completed their own journey or reached their goals. But they have a burning desire to figure out the subject and help others do the same.

So they put on the Reporter's hat and go in search of the truth. Usually, people who take on this role interview dozens, hundreds, or even thousands of people. They share these interviews and everything they've learned along the way with their audience. "Look, I found an expert who's already walked this path. Here's what they told me."

Why does this work? Because the Reporter isn't selling their own experience — they're selling someone else's expertise, packaged in a convenient format. The audience gets access to knowledge that the Reporter has gathered for them. And that creates value.

Let me add an important point. Taking on the Reporter personality is a great way to start a business in a niche you don't know much about yet. You can learn at the same time as you teach your audience. By asking questions of experts, you become an expert yourself. And your audience sees that journey and walks it with you.

What's the difference between the Adventurer and the Reporter?

The Reporter doesn't experiment themselves — they interview people who already know the answers. That's the main difference from the Adventurer, who dives into everything themselves and drags the audience along into experiments.

A metaphor to make it clear: The Adventurer = a traveler who goes into the jungle themselves. The Reporter = a journalist who interviews those who came back from the jungle.

The Reluctant Hero.

This is a modest hero who doesn't actually want attention or a big fuss made over their discoveries. They're more comfortable staying in the shadows. But they know that the information or secrets they hold are so important that they have to overcome their shyness and share them with the world. There's a moral duty that forces them to step into the light and tell everything they know.

Very often, the most skilled professionals and genuine experts fall into this personality type. They don't chase prestige or hype, but they understand — if they stay silent, people will keep making mistakes that could be avoided.

If this is you, there's no need to play the fearless Leader or the outgoing Reporter. Be the Reluctant Hero. Speak quietly, but with weight. Share knowledge not out of a desire for fame, but out of a sense of responsibility. Your audience will feel that sincerity. And it will build more trust than any marketing trick.

The main thing — be yourself.

So, you've now met the four types of Attractive Character: the Leader, the Adventurer, the Reporter, and the Reluctant Hero. Identify which type suits you best. Don't try to force yourself into someone else's mask. Choose the one that's closest to your nature, and start building your Attractive Character using that personality's traits.

With this, you'll already be getting results that are out of reach for your competitors.

Always remember: people can feel fake. And authenticity — sells.

And you could stop right here...

But I'm about to reveal another secret to you.

CHAPTER 6

The Daily Sitcom Starring You

> A note on sources: the idea of daily emails as a show with a running story builds on Russell Brunson's DotCom Secrets and Ben Settle's work on daily email.

This is the technique that turns readers into clients.

Here's the explanation behind it.

The thing is, most sales happen after many touchpoints with a client.

Not the third, fifth, or twentieth — often dozens later. It's after a client has engaged with you or your content again and again that the magic happens.

Here's the deal. For a stranger to start trusting us, they need to spend several hours with us in total — reading, watching, listening.

It doesn't matter whether it's an hour at a time or five minutes at a time — what matters is the total.

As you can imagine, it's very hard to get a stranger to watch or listen to you for a full hour. But they can spare five to ten minutes for your email.

And yes. Holding a reader's attention across that many touchpoints is also really hard. But I have a battle-tested tool for this. The idea is that through your email list, you need to create your own show — starring you.

More precisely — starring your Attractive Character.

Most experts and entrepreneurs, when they start running their channel or email list, make one mistake. They either go hard on selling or go hard on teaching their readers.

The thing is — that doesn't work.

People don't like being sold to or lectured. But people love being entertained and buying things. The ideal tool for this, as I've already said, is creating your own show. A show in the format of a sitcom.

In case you're not familiar, the sitcom format is what drives shows like Friends, Sex and the City, The Big Bang Theory, and Young Sheldon. The essence of a sitcom is that all episodes are tied together by one overarching story. At the same time, each episode is its own standalone story.

And these kinds of stories don't stress out the reader.

On the contrary, they entertain. That's why people will happily read you every single day. And the more often you make touchpoints, the faster you'll build that trust — and the sooner people start buying.

These emails have a specific structure. And it's beautifully simple.

1) A curiosity-driven subject line

2) An opening paragraph

3) A story (entertainment)

4) A takeaway from that story — your thoughts on it: this story teaches us... (light education)

5) An offer to buy your product. No hard selling. Just an offer to buy.

Let's break down each point in detail.

Ten Ways to Write Subject Lines That Are Practically Impossible to Ignore

The most important part of an email is the subject line.

You might push back and argue that actually, the most important thing in an email is an engaging story. Or a strong call to action. Or using NLP techniques so the reader falls into a trance and starts doing everything you tell them.

But none of that will work if the subject line doesn't catch their attention. The reader will simply ignore it. And then your brilliant story and offer will go unseen. Which means — no sales.

So. The subject line is the sign above the door into your world, inviting the reader to step inside.

The subject line is what makes your email stand out from the hundred other emails sitting in your potential client's inbox.

So never neglect your subject line. Ever.

And now I'll show you several ways to write subject lines that pull people in.

With all that said, let's start with...

Headline Type #1: "Shock Value"

One of the most powerful tools in a copywriter's arsenal is a headline that hits you like a bucket of cold water. Its job isn't to persuade, sell, or even explain. It operates on a more fundamental level: it jolts the person out of the state of information overload they're usually in when scrolling through their inbox or feed.

Every day your reader sees hundreds of emails, notifications, and ad messages. Their brain has long since developed a defense mechanism: ignore everything. So if you want your email to actually get opened, sometimes you need to use what I call the "Shock Value" technique.

The idea is simple: deliver a phrase that triggers an instant emotional reaction. That could be surprise, confusion, irritation, or even a quick laugh. The main thing — don't leave the person indifferent.

EXAMPLES

"I'M DELETING HALF OF MY EMAIL LIST TODAY"

"STOP POSTING ON FACEBOOK (FOR A WEEK)"

In every case, the "Shock Value" headline does only one thing — rips the reader out of their routine.

IMPORTANT RULES FOR USE

Always explain. The headline needs to be followed immediately in the email or article with a full explanation. If you leave the person confused for too long, it reads as manipulation.

Don't use shock for shock's sake. The goal isn't to offend anyone or stir up controversy. The goal is to grab attention and channel it in a productive direction.

Know your market. In creative circles, headlines like these are seen as bold and daring. In the legal or medical sectors, they can shatter trust.

Be ready for criticism. Shock tactics almost always trigger opposite reactions: some people love it, others are annoyed. That's normal.

BREAKING DOWN THE TECHNIQUE

Essentially, "shock value" is a brief emotional jolt. You give the person a micro-adventure right in their inbox.

Important to understand: these headlines shouldn't become your main strategy. Their power lies precisely in their rarity. Use them when you need to shake your audience up, recapture their attention, and remind them: these messages cannot be ignored.

Headline Type #2: "Curiosity"

If the previous type ("shock") works like a sledgehammer to the attention, "curiosity" is a hook that gently but irresistibly pulls the reader into the text.

And if I had to choose just one type of headline to use forever, this would be it. The reason is simple: people can resist logic, they can ignore benefits, they can look away from deadlines. But once curiosity gets its hooks in — they almost always start reading.

WHY IT WORKS.

The great Gary Halbert said: the most powerful force in advertising is curiosity. It can sell a product the person didn't know existed a minute ago. It can make a reader push through twenty pages of dense copy just to get one answer.

Curiosity is a psychological itch. The headline creates a question, and the brain can't rest easy with an unanswered question. The only way to scratch it is to open the email, read the post, or watch the video to the end.

EXAMPLES

"SANTA'S MAGIC PLAN FOR 2023"

"HE WAS MADE OF IRON, BUT THEN..."

In every case, the headline doesn't promise a benefit directly and doesn't sell straight up. Its job is to leave a "gap" in the reader's worldview — one they're compelled to fill by reading the text.

RULES FOR USE

Don't promise — create a question. Be specific. The best curiosity headlines contain a detail — a name, a date, an unusual word, a hint at a situation.

The headline sparks interest, but the body of the text has to deliver on that interest.

Play on natural instincts. People are always interested in: other people's secrets, unexpected predictions, forbidden techniques, personal stories. Headlines built around these themes work especially powerfully.

BREAKING DOWN THE TECHNIQUE

Curiosity is a universal tool. It works in any niche — from health and finance to creativity and B2B.

A well-crafted "curiosity" headline can do more than just boost email open rates or post views. It can open doors to new opportunities: attracting the attention of industry peers, potential partners, or clients who otherwise never would have noticed you.

Every time you're writing a subject line or a post title, ask yourself: does this headline create a question that the reader will want answered right now? If yes — then you've nailed it.

Headline Type #3: “Direct Benefit”

If “shock” is a jolt and “curiosity” is a hook, then “direct benefit” is solid bedrock. This type of headline doesn’t play with emotions or look for back doors: it immediately shows the person what they’ll get by opening the email or reading the text.

Sure, there’s less magic and provocation here. But direct benefits have been the foundation of advertising for decades. People always ask themselves one question: “What’s in it for me?” The more clearly you answer that in the headline, the easier it is to decide to keep reading.

WHY IT WORKS.

Our market is already overloaded with information, stories, and promises. But a simple, clear benefit always stays relevant. When someone sees a direct solution to their pain or a direct path to their desired outcome, they don’t need to overthink it.

These headlines work especially well:

1) in “heavy” niches where solving problems is the primary motivation (health, finance, business);

2) when the audience isn’t ready yet for humor or provocation;

3) when a quick result is important (for example, when launching promotions or special offers).

EXAMPLES

“HOW TO WRITE A SALES POST IN 15 MINUTES”

“HOW TO DO A TARGET AUDIENCE ANALYSIS IN 7 MINUTES”

In classic copywriting, headlines like these were common:

“How to Get Rid of Cellulite”

“How to Earn More While Working Less”

All of them follow one formula: “How to [achieve X] without [pain Y].”

RULES FOR USE

Be specific. The more precise the benefit, the harder the headline hits. “How to Get Rid of a Headache in 10 Minutes” is more compelling than

“How to Feel Better.”

Use the market’s language. A direct benefit should be phrased in the same words your audience uses to describe their pains and desires.

Be honest. Unlike “shock” and “curiosity,” there’s nowhere to hide behind wordplay here. If the benefit turns out to be empty, trust in you will evaporate fast.

BREAKING DOWN THE TECHNIQUE

Headlines with direct benefits are the most universal format. They don’t always generate excitement, but they almost always deliver consistent results.

Headline Type #4: “The Weird One”

There are headlines that don’t promise a benefit and don’t play the dramatic “shock” card. Their job is different — to knock the reader off-balance through absurdity, strangeness, or an unexpected association.

The reader is used to seeing the same clichés in their feeds and inboxes: “Last chance to get the discount,” “Register before it’s too late”...

The brain stopped noticing all of that long ago. But when a headline shows up with something deliberately bizarre in it — attention sharpens instantly.

WHY IT WORKS

Weirdness is the antidote to predictability. It triggers a smile, confusion, or at least a passing “What on earth does that even mean?” And that’s enough to get the person to open the email or post.

It’s how tabloid headlines work: “Actress Marries Alien,” “Scientists Discover City Inhabited by Intelligent Dinosaurs.” We know it sounds ridiculous — and that’s exactly why we want the details.

In marketing, this technique gives you an immediate way to stand out from a hundred look-alike messages.

EXAMPLES FROM MY OWN HEADLINES

“MY CAT AND STRATEGIC MARKETING”

“THE PHYSICIST WHO’S 98 YEARS OLD”

“GETTING SLAPPED WITH A FISH”

“ANGELS, ORCS, AND LIARS”

All these headlines share one thing: they sound “out of place” — and that’s exactly what makes the reader open the text and start looking for an explanation.

RULES FOR USE

Weirdness must always lead to meaning. The headline can be absurd, but in the text you’re obligated to reveal why it was needed.

Don’t overdo it. If every single email sounds like surrealism, the audience will stop trusting you.

Watch the context. In creative niches, weirdness reads as freshness. In more conservative ones — it can trigger confusion and rejection.

BREAKING DOWN THE TECHNIQUE

A weird headline is a pattern-breaker. Its goal is to pull the person out of “autopilot” mode and force their imagination to switch on.

It’s not always the best way to sell, but it’s an excellent tactic for engagement and for building a unique voice. When you inject a little “absurdity” into your communication, people start to remember your content better.

Headline Type #5: “Contrast”

Contrast is one of the most powerful cognitive triggers.

When we see two words or two ideas that don’t normally go together, the brain is forced to stop. An internal glitch occurs: familiar logic breaks down, and a sharp need to make sense of it arises.

In headlines, this works especially powerfully. Contrast instantly grabs attention and simultaneously sparks curiosity: “How is that even possible?”

WHY IT WORKS

We're used to predictable pairings: success = wealth, marketing = growth, doctor = health.

But when a phrase like "Eye Doctor Blinded" or "Supervillain Reveals the Secrets of Ethical Marketing" appears — cognitive dissonance kicks in.

Such a headline doesn't just stand out — it literally forces the brain to go looking for an explanation. Which means the odds of the email or post being opened multiply dramatically.

EXAMPLES

"SAINTLY MARKETING ON SINFUL GROUND"

"HOW LOSING CAN BE BETTER THAN WINNING"

"THE EVIL GENIUS IN THE SERVICE OF HIS CLIENTS"

RULES FOR USE

Keep the balance. The contrast shouldn't exist for the sake of a pretty paradox — it should create a real conceptual connection that you'll unpack in the text.

Play on stereotypes. Contrast works best when it shatters a familiar expectation.

Don't confuse it with absurdity. A weird headline ("Seasonal Sale on Pregnant Flies") and a contrast headline are two different things. Contrast always has an internal logic.

Reveal the meaning of the headline right away. If the reader senses that the contrast was an empty trick, trust crumbles.

BREAKING DOWN THE TECHNIQUE

Contrast headlines are a way to make your audience look at obvious things from an unexpected angle. They simultaneously surprise and promise a new insight.

When someone sees "How to Increase Sales by Offering Worse Terms" — they can't scroll past, because it contradicts everything they've ever heard. And it's precisely that promise of "shattering a stereotype" that leads them to read the text.

Headline Type #6: "Challenging a Dogma"

Every market lives by dogmas.

Those are the "unwritten rules" that seem so obvious nobody even questions them. The customer is always right. You need to give as much value as possible. Sales are about the funnel. These ideas become part of the collective consciousness, passed from mouth to mouth (from one brain to another), and eventually turn into axioms.

But here's the paradox: dogmas are precisely what most often holds businesses back from growing. They create an illusion of stability, lock thinking into "the way it's always done" — and in doing so, kill fresh ideas.

That's why headlines that challenge dogmas carry a special kind of power. They don't just grab attention — they position you as a thinker capable of questioning the industry's "sacred cows."

When you say "Copywriting Doesn't Work" or "The Customer Is Always Wrong," you instantly stand out from the crowd. A headline like that carries a challenge. It doesn't promise yet another tip on "how to sell through Stories" — it promises a fundamental shift in how you understand the rules of the game.

And that's precisely what drives the reader to open the text — to check: what if everything they've always believed actually doesn't work?

WHY IT WORKS.

We build decisions on "rules" without ever re-examining them. When a headline undermines a rule, the brain shifts from autopilot to exploration mode: a cognitive gap opens up that you want to close by reading. It's related to the "contrast" technique, but it's not about clashing words — it's about undermining a belief.

Examples.

“BETTER TO READ ONE BOOK 10 TIMES THAN 10 BOOKS ONCE.”

“A NEW WAY TO GROW, EVEN THOUGH IT’S A MILLION YEARS OLD”

“THE CUSTOMER ISN’T ALWAYS RIGHT. AND HERE’S WHEN YOU NEED TO PUSH BACK”

RULES FOR USE

Hit a widespread dogma. If a belief is held by 5% of the market — no effect. Go hunting for “sacred cows.”

Don’t go overboard. Challenging a dogma ≠ being provocative. The thesis needs a solid foundation: case studies, data, a mechanism.

Keep it respectful. We’re arguing with an idea, not humiliating the people who follow it. That’s how you build trust, not toxicity.

BREAKING DOWN THE TECHNIQUE

“Challenging a Dogma” is an invitation to reconsider. It amplifies your expertise: you’re not just sharing tips, you’re re-educating the market. That’s why these headlines are perfect for manifestos, analysis pieces, strategy breakdowns — and they’re especially powerful when you need to stand out from “the way everyone else does it.”

Headline Type #7: “Numbers”

Numbers have a special power over perception.

They turn an abstract promise into something concrete: not just “ways to earn more,” but “10 ways to earn more”; not just “mistakes in marketing,” but “5 mistakes that are killing your sales.” Even if the topic itself isn’t all that exciting, a number in the headline triggers an innate curiosity reflex: “Which specific points are these?”

That’s how the psychology of completion works: if someone is told there are 7 steps, they want to see all of them.

WHY IT WORKS.

Specificity. A number signals that the material is well-structured and easy to navigate.

Predictability. The reader understands how much “value” is waiting for them.

Comparison. We subconsciously evaluate: “10 ways is better than 3.”

Built-in promise. The number hints that the author has done the work for the reader: selected, counted, systematized.

EXAMPLES

“THE 5 BIGGEST MISTAKES EXPERTS MAKE”

“3 REASONS WHY PEOPLE NEVER MAKE IT TO THE PURCHASE”

“120 MINUTES TO PACKAGE YOUR INSTAGRAM PROFILE”

RULES FOR USE

Be accurate. The number needs to match reality. “37 ways” means exactly 37 — not 25 padded out.

Use “non-standard” numbers. Headlines with “7,” “13,” “27” often come across as more credible than “10.”

Clarify the benefit. A number on its own works, but paired with a clear value it becomes even stronger.

Avoid overloading. If every single email you send is “10 ways to...,” your audience tunes out fast.

BREAKING DOWN THE TECHNIQUE

Headlines with numbers are the ideal tool for education, checklists, methodologies, and systematized experience. They work especially well where the audience is feeling overwhelmed by chaos and is searching for structure.

On one hand, numbers are easy to copy (every other blogger writes “7 steps to success”). On the other — it’s precisely the specificity and structure that shape an expert image: you’re not musing in vague generalities, you’re presenting a system that can be tested and applied.

Headline Type #8: “Authority and Proof”

A promise alone isn’t enough. The world of advertising is full of bold claims, and most readers have learned not to trust them. But when a proof point is added to the promise, or when the promise comes from an authority figure, perception shifts.

We trust experts. We trust facts. We trust names that carry a track record. That’s why headlines that appeal to authoritative sources or are backed by a concrete fact consistently outperform abstract “best tips” or “secret methods.”

Gary Bencivenga, one of the greatest copywriters of the 20th century, taught: “If you can prove it — prove it. Proof sells better than a hundred suppositions.” Eugene Schwartz said: “One absolutely true statement is worth more than a hundred half-truths.” And who are we to argue with them?

WHY IT WORKS

Proof reduces skepticism. The reader sees that the words are backed by facts or a specific name.

Authority builds trust. If a well-known expert, company, or figure says something — attention automatically intensifies.

The “social leverage” effect. You borrow credibility from a well-known figure and transfer it to your text.

EXAMPLES

“DAN KENNEDY’S SECRET THAT SAVES LAUNCHES FROM FAILURE”

“GOLDMAN SACHS FINANCIAL ANALYST EXPLAINS WHY 80% OF BUSINESSES ARE LOSING MONEY ON ADS”

“JAPAN STUDY: HOW 92% OF COMPANIES SURVIVE A CRISIS”

In every case, the power isn’t in the promise itself — it’s in the specific person, story, or fact that stands behind it.

RULES FOR USE

Pull in names. Celebrities, respected experts, historical or cultural figures — these always amplify trust.

Add a fact. Age, a number, a profession, a specific result — any "piece of reality" increases credibility.

Use cultural codes. Sometimes authority comes not just from names, but from things people hold in high regard (the military, science, the classics).

Avoid fakery. If a name or "proof" is dropped in just for decorative effect, with no logical follow-through, trust collapses fast.

BREAKING DOWN THE TECHNIQUE

Headlines with authority and proof work because the reader isn't prepared to argue with a fact. You're not just saying: "This method works," you're showing: "Here's a well-known expert, here's a concrete result, here's the evidence."

As a result, even the most skeptical subscriber opens the email. Because arguing with a "world record," a "98-year-old physicist," or "Dan Kennedy's secret" is a lot harder than arguing with yet another "top life hack."

Headline Type #9: "Seasonal"

Seasonal headlines are one of the most underrated tools out there. They work because they tap directly into what your audience is already thinking about at a specific moment. Holidays, seasonal transitions, significant dates — all of these are selling opportunities that trigger no resistance: the reader is open, because the topic resonates with their reality.

Robert Collier said: "Enter the conversation already taking place in the mind of the customer." Seasonal headlines do exactly that: you connect your offer to the calendar, a holiday, or a cultural event.

EXAMPLES

"NEW YEAR'S SALES FORECAST: BORING, BUT ACCURATE"

"HOW TO SURVIVE BLACK FRIDAY WITHOUT DYING FROM DISCOUNTS"

"CHRISTMAS MARKETING WITHOUT SANTA AND CANDY CANES"

“7 SALES LESSONS I GOT FROM GROUNDHOG DAY”

“WHAT’S REALLY HAPPENING WITH SALES IN JULY”

RULES FOR USE

Tie yourself to the moment. The closer the date or event, the higher the response.

Avoid the obvious. “Christmas sale” performs worse than an unexpected twist (“Grandma Got Run Over by a Guru During New Year’s Holidays”).

Add value. Connect the holiday to a lesson, an insight, or an offer.

BREAKING DOWN THE TECHNIQUE

Seasonal headlines create a sense of relevance and “here and now.” They work as a soft trigger: the person opens the email or post not just for your idea, but because the topic is already on their radar.

This makes seasonal headlines ideal for launches, sales, year-end recaps, and forecasts. The key is to not stop at the “New Year’s discount” template — always look for an unexpected angle.

Headline Type #10: “Mix and Match”

All the previous nine headline types are building blocks. But a true master doesn’t limit themselves to one technique. The real magic starts when you mix techniques together: a little curiosity + authority, numbers + weirdness, benefit + challenging a dogma.

In headlines, as in music or cooking, synergy often works better than any single pure technique. One element catches attention, another builds trust, a third adds surprise. The result is a multi-layered headline — and it’s almost impossible to resist opening the email.

WHY IT WORKS

Combinations trigger different levers. Curiosity pulls you forward, numbers promise structure, authority strengthens trust.

Variety saves you from predictability. If the reader keeps seeing “10 ways to…” from you, they stop reacting.

Each segment finds its own. Some are hooked by humor, others by value, others by the paradox.

EXAMPLES

“7 SALES LESSONS FROM A STAND-UP COMEDIAN WHO BOMBED ON STAGE”

“ELON MUSK’S WEIRD SECRET THAT WORKS IN SMALL BUSINESS”

“3 REASONS WHY DEADLINES KILL SALES”

“WHY HARRY POTTER WAS THE BEST MARKETER OF THE 21ST CENTURY”

RULES FOR USE

Don’t overdo it. Two or three techniques in one headline is enough.

Keep the logic. The combination should lead to an explanation in the text — not exist just for the sake of a pretty mix.

Test formats. Sometimes “number + benefit” works best, sometimes “weirdness + authority.”

Play boldly. Combined headlines give you freedom — try unexpected combinations.

BREAKING DOWN THE TECHNIQUE

Mixing is the pinnacle of mastery. When you stop thinking in separate types and start playing with combinations, your headlines become unpredictable yet recognizable.

The reader sees: on one side — specificity, on the other — intrigue, on top — authority. A headline like that doesn’t just “sell the email open” — it builds an aura of creativity and expertise around you.

A note on prompts and working with AI.

Personally, I prefer to write the headline for a post after the post is written, not before. Though some copywriters do the headline first, then everything else. But that’s up to you.

Here’s the prompt logic.

AI PROMPT

Step into the role of a world-class copywriter with more than 20 years of experience.

Someone who writes incredibly engaging and compelling emails every day — both for their own list and for their clients' lists — generating millions in revenue every day.

Write 20 headline variations based on the instructions and examples below.

[insert the text "Ten Ways to Write Subject Lines That Are Practically Impossible to Ignore"]

I'm attaching a detailed description of the target audience to this task. The headlines must attract exactly this audience and repel everyone else.

We're writing the headline for this post:

[insert the post text, or if there's no post yet, describe the topic you want to write about]

Attach the target audience document to the prompt.

The Opening Paragraph: Five Formulas That Hook from the First Line and Hold Attention All the Way to the Final Period.

Here's a stat.

If a person reads the first 20% of a text, there's an 80% chance they'll read the whole thing to the end. This reflects a simple behavioral mechanism: as invested attention grows, the "don't want to quit halfway" effect kicks in, along with reading inertia and the anticipation of a reward for time already spent. So the more effectively you guide the reader through the first stretch of text, the better the chance they'll make it to your offer — and make a purchase.

What the first paragraph needs to do.

Ignite curiosity. Your job with the opening is to lure the reader deeper into the text.

Set the tone (rhythm, voice, energy level). You can change the pace later, but the first beat sets the “musical key” of the entire piece.

Bridge from the headline to the substance. If the headline promised one thing and the first paragraph wanders off somewhere else — attention is lost.

Be unpredictable. Identical openings go stale, even if they’re individually strong.

Five working ideas for the first paragraph.

1) Time and Place

A scene removes cognitive friction: the brain “sees” the picture — and enters the text more easily. The trick isn’t just to name a time or place, but to build a frame (1–2 details that can be felt).

EXAMPLES:

“Last week the phone rang. I picked up — and it was my ex-wife, who I hadn’t spoken to in 20 years and would have happily gone another 20 without…”

“The last few months I’ve been obsessed with Breaking Bad…”

“Last night, close to midnight, standing in the shower washing off the day, something clicked…”

“This morning, while the coffee machine was screaming steam at me, I caught myself thinking something strange about conversion rates…”

2) Subheadline (bridge to the core idea)

This is a short secondary line that supports the headline’s promise and adds emotion or framing.

EXAMPLES:

“Fair warning. The eggs are chicken eggs. No gender discrimination intended…” — instant framing, humor, tension release, bridge to the topic of objections.

Then — a second mini-block: “Actually, this email would’ve been better titled... But come on, eggs are more interesting, right?...” — you explain why you chose that angle.

“Straight up: I’m going to show you a technique that removes 80% of a buyer’s objections.”

“In one sentence: this is a way to get your audience’s attention back, even when they’ve had enough content.”

3) Quote

A quote transfers voice and status — it gives your idea a shoulder to lean on. Works well when a short explanation follows the quote — your own take on it.

EXAMPLE:

“Same shit, different day.” The Shawshank Redemption.

I’ve been watching the same pattern repeat itself for 7 years. Marketers and their ilk keep using different new tools and making the exact same mistake every time...

By the way, I recommend keeping a dedicated folder for quotes. So you always have a selection for every occasion.

I keep several private notes folders where I drop anything that catches my eye. One for headlines, one for quotes, one for post ideas. I’d recommend doing the same.

4) Teaser (entering at the peak of the story)

Jump straight into the hottest point of the story or conflict. No warm-up.

A classic example of this: the very first scene of the very first episode of Breaking Bad. The main character racing through the desert in an RV, wearing just underwear and a gas mask. And only then does the story of how it all started unfold.

Or the film Limitless — the main character standing on the edge of a balcony, thinking about jumping. And then the story of how it all began.

EXAMPLE:

“Night. Blizzard. I’m passing an 18-wheeler. Speed: 60 miles an hour. And then headlights from an oncoming car hit me straight in the eyes...”

5) A simple, conversational line

This is how you’d normally start a phone call with a close friend. No preamble, no pleasantries. Just straight in.

EXAMPLES:

“I want to share one pretty sad story with you...”

“This kind of thing happens to everyone. But it feels like it happens to me more than most.”

“Quick honesty moment. I myself did this wrong for an entire year...”

How to choose the right opening style for the task

Need to quickly “catch” the attention of a cold audience? Go with a teaser or a scene.

Need to ease into a complex idea without resistance? Use a bridging subheadline or a simple conversational line.

Need to add weight to a promise or an offer? Open with a quote (authority, social proof), then add your interpretation.

First Paragraph Micro-Checklist (1-minute review)

Is there a hook? (a question, a conflict, a promise, a scene)

Does it bridge the headline’s promise? (no bait-and-switch)

One idea — one paragraph.

Read it aloud. Does it sound natural? Is there anything that grates or trips the tongue? Does it make you want to keep reading?

Unpredictability. Are you repeating yesterday’s opening style?

The key is variety. Today a scene, tomorrow a quote, the day after a teaser. That way you never let your audience get used to how you start — and every piece of content becomes a small adventure. Which is exactly what people already love.

The Entertainment Story. What Should You Actually Write About to Keep People Hooked?

Now we move to the main body of the email — the story that entertains.

What to write about?

Everything and anything that relates to you, your life, your work, and your product.

- a story from your childhood;
- something that happened in your life today — or will happen tomorrow;
- a scene from a favorite movie or TV show;
- an interesting idea from a book you're reading or have read;
- a case study of yours — successful or not;
- your take on what your competitors are doing;
- a historical fact;
- market news...

And here are a few more post ideas:

- What's going on in your life right now?
- What's something you're embarrassed about? (Remember the AC's flaws?)
- What are you planning to do during the holiday season? Do you even take vacations?
- If yes, where are you planning to spend your vacation this year?
- What did you buy recently that you regret?

- What did you buy recently that you're absolutely loving?
- What made you scream in rage yesterday that you're laughing about today?
- What crazy stunt did your kid or dog pull yesterday?
- What's something funny or sad from your past — and what lesson did you take from it?

These are emails "about nothing." Just random episodes and entertaining stories.

The most important thing — don't force it. Don't sit down to write and agonize over squeezing something out every single time.

There's a simple and effective tool for this. I already mentioned it above. Write down everything interesting that happens around you.

You're watching a movie, you catch an interesting story or a compelling insight, or the villain delivers an incredible monologue — write it down.

You remember something from your childhood, or you met up with friends and they shared something interesting — voice-record it into your notes channel. But make it clear enough to understand later.

You spotted a funny ad or a dumb offer from a competitor — take a photo. It'll give you something to roast later.

You had an insight during a walk — pull out your phone right away and write it down.

You heard a funny joke or a wise parable that hits you in the gut — add it to the vault.

You're reading a book and you come across something brilliant — take a photo, run text recognition, drop it into your ideas channel.

In short, everything that personally interests you — stockpile it for later.

With this approach, you will never(!) struggle with what to write about. Your problem will be choosing from what you already have.

Set yourself a target — add 5 ideas to the vault every day. At first it'll feel hard, but then you'll get into the groove and it becomes pure routine. A content idea factory.

The Takeaway From the Story: Planting the Right Ideas in Your Reader's Head.

If the previous part of the post was "entertainment," this is where we shift to "education."

But education on our terms.

Here's what I mean. We told a story. With that story, we pulled the reader into our world. We attracted the people we want and filtered out everyone else.

This doesn't happen deliberately. It just naturally works out that way. When we tell a story, we always tell it through the lens of our own consciousness and worldview. And people either embrace it or simply stop reading and leave. What remains are loyal readers who share our view of the world.

At that moment, they BELIEVE us.

And at that moment, you can plant ANY idea in their head. Even a negative one. Even an unethical one. That's exactly why I always tell the people I teach to stay grounded in ethics and proceed with care.

Because this is one of the most powerful tools of influence over a reader.

So what do we do in this part of the post? We draw a conclusion from the story: what exactly I think about all this and what lesson I can take away from everything that happened. The more unexpected and counter-intuitive that conclusion is, the deeper it will embed itself in the reader's head.

To make it concrete, let me give you a few examples of complete posts.

Standing Firm Where Others Fall

OPENING

And that's the best strategy for thriving.

Here's what I mean.

STORY

Like the vast majority of people, I always wanted results fast, big, and right now.

And for a long time, I operated exactly on that strategy.

As it turned out — it's fundamentally wrong...

The paradox is this: the faster you chase success, the slower it comes.

The slow path turns out to be the fast one, because the fast path often leads nowhere.

From personal observations.

The people most obsessed with "explosive growth" and "rapid scaling" often grow the slowest. They spend years stuck in fire-fighting mode.

Rushing breeds rash decisions, and rash decisions create long-term problems.

When you're in a hurry:

— You treat symptoms instead of eliminating the cause

— You make emotional decisions you later regret

— You double the load on a team that's already at its limit

Every poorly solved problem creates two new problems tomorrow.

Those problems breed new ones.

Simple geometric progression.

Where I landed in the end.

Most markets aren't a "winner takes all" race.

In most niches, there's room for multiple players.

Your job isn't to be first. Your job is to still be in the game when the others have dropped out.

TAKEAWAY

And that's where the key insight lives.

When you stay in business for a long time and keep your focus on one thing, three things happen:

1) You become a master. Not because you're talented — but because repetition is the mother of skill.

2) Reputation builds up. Clients start coming through referrals. Marketing gets easier.

3) The compound effect kicks in. Small improvements stack on top of each other, and over the years they produce an exponential result.

You simply pick a direction and grind toward it for years.

Boring? Absolutely. Effective? Undeniably.

Here's the metaphor that helped me internalize this.

Business isn't a sprint and it's not even a marathon. It's hiking on foot from one end of the country to the other, the long way around.

You can try to sprint the first 100 miles. But the person who walks at a steady pace will go further in the end.

Because the truth is, resilience (and persistence) beats speed.

P.S. Yeah, I know — you want a magic formula. But the only formula that actually works is time multiplied by consistency.

Everything else is beautiful illusions.

How I Joined the Copycat Club

OPENING

“We’re going to run the exact same ads as our competitors!”

STORY

That statement kicked off nearly every planning meeting with the real estate developers I used to work with.

And how did it usually end? Let me walk you through it.

The thing about real estate developers building apartment complexes is that they live under the intense scrutiny of a massive number of different regulatory bodies.

And every single one of them is just burning to find some little violation — and slap the developer with a fine for it. And the fines are no joke.

And naturally, when a company gets hit with fines, the employees feel it too.

So when it came to marketing innovation, the mood there was absolutely bleak.

The usual routine went like this: I’d push hard, recommending they try something new. And they’d eventually do it. Roughly three years later. After the most daring competitors had already tested those innovations on themselves, taken all the cream off the top, and proven it was safe and fine-free.

Only then would my developers start implementing that tool or tactic. By which point the train had already left the station.

And now for the copycat part.

The typical ad campaign planning process with my developers went like this:

1) At the appointed time, everyone responsible for advertising and sales gathers together.

2) They put on their “thinking” faces and start trying to remember what competitors had done or are currently doing.

3) From all of that, they pick what the majority (or the commercial director) likes — and write it into the action plan for the next month.

4) The plan gets executed.

And you know what other developers do?

Do you think they come up with something new?

No!

98% of developers do exactly the same thing!

That is, everyone copies everyone else — out of fear of fines and personal performance penalties.

Year after year, the whole niche copies itself.

Once in a while, something new and fresh pops up... But that’s the exception.

CONCLUSION

Here’s where I’m going with this.

In marketing, most people play exactly this copycat game. Simply because they’re afraid to try something new. This is especially true in large companies. Because a hired employee would rather do nothing new than take a risk — and potentially get their head bitten off.

And you know what?

You don't need to look at what everyone else is doing. If everyone (the majority) were right, then everyone would be rich, healthy, and happy. Is that what you see?

That's exactly why you should look at what the majority does — and then do it your own way.

Don't join the copycat club.

It only produces more of the same.

And do you really need that?

Marketing Aikido and Eggs

INTRO

Fair warning upfront. The eggs are chicken eggs. No gender politics in this post.

Actually, this letter would have been better titled "How to Eliminate Every Objection in Sales Before It Even Starts." But come on — the egg angle is way more interesting and adds a bit of mystery.

STORY

Alright.

In any kind of sales, for them to actually happen, you need to do serious work on objections. The more objections, the fewer sales.

And here's where the paradox kicks in.

Objections are handled with reasoning and arguments.

And they work!

But only on people who already trust you.

For a skeptical audience, however, every argument you make will be met with a counter-argument, every point with a counterpoint.

And the harder you push to prove yourself, the more you erode their trust.

So what do you do?

You're about to understand. Let me give you two examples:

Text #1.

"The best way to fry eggs is sunny-side up. Here's how to do it properly..."

Text #2.

"My favorite way to fry eggs is sunny-side up. Here's how I make mine..."

See the difference?

In the first case, you're aggressively teaching and imposing your opinion. Like, I'm right and you uneducated losers need to be taught how to fry eggs.

And that, naturally, triggers a ton of objections. Because everyone has their own favorite way to fry eggs, and good luck convincing them otherwise.

Unless you're a mega-celebrity writing for your most die-hard fans — the ones who'll believe anything you say.

In any other situation — you'll generate a wave of pushback.

In the second case — you're simply sharing your experience. You're not imposing your opinion on anyone. You don't care what anyone thinks — whether you're right or wrong. You're just saying: this is what I like.

And that approach almost completely eliminates the urge to argue with you. Instead, it creates the desire to try it yourself. Like: hey, maybe it's good that way too!

In the end, it all comes down to eggs. Or rather — the perspective you choose when talking about them.

CONCLUSION

What's the lesson here?

If you think about it — you're not forcibly changing anyone's beliefs. You're modeling beliefs at the subconscious level.

And that's all from me for today.

How I Turned Into a Skeleton on Keto — and Survived

INTRO

Last night I looked at myself in the mirror and realized one simple truth.

I'll never experiment with diets again without actually thinking it through first.

STORY

Here's what happened.

About three months ago I went down a rabbit hole reading about the keto diet.

The idea behind keto is ketosis. That's when your body burns fat for energy instead of carbs. Everything I read said that if you eat fat instead of carbs, you'll have energy like the Energizer Bunny.

You'll grind like a workhorse and never get tired.

I thought: perfect! That's exactly what I need. I've got a mountain of stuff to do, projects piling up, and by evening I'm running on empty.

Thought about it and decided: I'll try this magical keto. What have I got to lose?

As it turned out — I lost weight. And I didn't have much to begin with.

But let me take it from the top.

What does the keto diet actually look like in real life?

It's when you basically say goodbye to carbs almost completely. You keep maybe 50-70 grams a day. And you eat meat, fish, eggs, butter, and all kinds of animal fats like there's no tomorrow.

Plus vegetables for fiber. But no fruit — fruit is carbs.

I also decided to throw in intermittent fasting. I ate only at 11am and 5pm. From 5pm to 11am the next morning — nothing. Empty stomach.

And you know what?

The first two weeks I actually felt pretty great. Energy was through the roof. I wasn't particularly hungry. I thought: "Damn, I'm a genius! I found the secret to becoming a superhuman!"

And then I looked in the mirror three weeks in...

And I was floored.

I was already a skinny guy. But I'd dropped another 11 pounds! I looked like a skeleton.

Even though I was genuinely eating a lot. Just twice a day, but until I was stuffed.

But that's not even the worst part.

Somewhere around the third week, my liver and gallbladder started acting up. Apparently they weren't used to processing that much fat and meat. Some unpleasant sensations started showing up on my right side.

And then I said to myself: "Screw this experiment!"...

CONCLUSION

And here's the lesson I took away from all of it.

When someone sells you something with a shiny wrapper, always ask yourself: "Do I actually need this?"

With keto — I wanted energy. What I got was weight loss.

It's like buying a car for speed and getting great fuel economy instead. Not bad, sure, but not what you wanted.

Now here's the really interesting part.

The keto diet is a perfect example of a unique mechanism in action.

Look: "Eat tons of fatty steaks and lose weight!"

Sounds crazy, right? The complete opposite of everything we've ever been told about dieting.

And that's exactly the mechanism I fell for.

And you know what? A unique mechanism really works. Even on battle-hardened marketers like me.

Because it breaks the pattern in your head. It makes you believe something that sounds illogical — but promises to solve your problem.

“Gorge on fatty meat and get lean” — that’s complete nonsense from a common-sense standpoint!

But that’s precisely why it works.

OFFER

That’s the power of a properly built unique mechanism: it breaks the pattern in the reader’s head.

And that’s exactly the kind of mechanism worth building into your own offer.

Want to see how to build one? —>

Offer: a call to buy your product. No hard selling.

Everything that came before — all of it was grabbing attention, entertaining, and conditioning your reader’s brain...

And all of it had one single goal.

The goal is to tie those stories to your product and subtly motivate people to buy your product or products.

That’s the secret. That’s how you start making real money — not in one flash, but consistently over the long term.

If you just send entertaining emails without tying them to your products or services, you won’t make a single penny. Even if you’re the world’s best storyteller. Every email and every story must be connected to some kind of offer for your audience.

If you don’t have an offer right now, then send your reader to a useful resource, or give them something to think about. Or simply ask them to like the post or leave a comment. You need to train a “reflex” in your reader — after reading your post, they should take some kind of action.

P.S.:

I love using a postscript in my posts. You can use it to drop one more thought or idea that sticks in the reader's brain. There are no templates or rules here. It's like the cherry on top of your cake. Or like a hot chili pepper in a rice dish — it adds a kick and a bit of flair.

You can do it, or you don't have to. Your call.

Now, about AI prompts.

Whatever anyone says, I don't recommend using AI to write posts for your warm-audience email list. I've tried it — the results are garbage. I don't even ask it to correct my typos.

Because my typos carry my personality. Yes, really. My imperfections come through, in part, through those little mistakes. That's why I don't edit my posts. I write on flow. And no — I'm not telling you to be or look illiterate and make mistakes in your writing on purpose.

However, it does happen that someone truly can't write. So what then?

Here's the algorithm:

1. Open a new AI chat and paste a link to the channel of an author whose style you like and want to write like. Ask for a detailed style analysis and a mega-prompt. Mention that the AI will use this mega-prompt going forward to write posts.
2. Edit the resulting prompt to fit you + add: "When writing the post, use the instructions below." Then paste the full text of Chapter 7.
3. Next, paste in the resulting prompt and the idea for your post. You can even voice-record your thoughts, have them transcribed, and ask the AI to turn the transcription into a post based on those ideas.
4. Always edit what comes out. Read the text out loud and smooth over anything that catches on your tongue or sounds off to your ear.

And moving forward — try to write on your own as much as possible. Once you get in the groove, a post will take you no more than 20 minutes a day.

CHAPTER 7

Sales Copy

So. You've brought your potential client into your cozy email list. There, you pulled them into your world with engaging letters. In those letters, you told stories and shared your experience.

All of that was done with one purpose: so that at the end of the letter, you could give them an offer — a call to click through to your sales page.

Pay attention. Inside the email itself, you're not making the sale of your product or service. That's not the right move.

The right move is to give an offer inside the email — one that gets your reader to click the link.

Why that's the right approach will become clear once we walk through the full sales page (spoiler: there's way too much information to fit into a single email).

To make sure we're on the same page, let's unpack what the word "offer" actually means.

An offer is your call to action for your audience — a prompt to do something.

Every step on your Customer Journey should end with an offer. An offer that moves the potential client to the next step on their path. These are intermediate offers.

Then there are the main offers — the ones that actually sell the product. Main offers consist of several components, and there will be a dedicated chapter on those.

But let's get back to the topic of sales copy. So.

The Five-Step Formula for Maximum Conversions That Will Drive Your Sales

In this chapter, we'll take a detailed look at my 5-step sales page formula. And there's nothing complicated about it. I broke this process down into the simplest possible components — for my own sanity. The result? I write sales letters and other copy much faster, with far less overwhelm and frustration.

On top of that, I immediately started seeing better response rates on my copy.

The five steps are:

1) headline,

2) opening paragraph,

3) story,

4) bullets,

5) close (offer).

And the first step — the headline. This is, without a doubt, the most valuable part of your entire sales page. Just like in any other advertising activity.

We already talked about the importance of headlines when we covered subject lines for your emails.

In a sales page, the headline is just as critical.

Just picture it: your potential client got your email in their inbox. The subject line caught their eye. They clicked and opened it. Read it. Clicked the link. Landed on your sales page... and found something dull and uninspiring. Not attractive at all. You'd agree — that's a pretty lousy scenario. And most likely, your subscriber will close the sales page without reading it.

So keep your reader's attention at every single stage.

Let's break each step down one by one.

1. The "Proof" Headline

This is the hardest headline to pull off — but the most effective. Let me show you how "proof" works, using a headline I once wrote for a guide on sales copy:

> An online traffic and funnel expert whose sales copy regularly earns praise from the directors and producers of the most prominent online schools reveals his secret method for making far more sales while spending far less time writing copy.

If I'd just written "How to Make More Sales" — it would've been boring and generic. Indistinguishable from the competition. But I added proof: "An online traffic and funnel expert whose sales copy regularly earns praise from the directors and producers of the most prominent online schools." That immediately sets the headline apart from competitors and sparks at least curiosity. Which was exactly the goal. On top of that, the phrase "reveals his secret method..." — which is inherently dramatic — gives the headline even more power, making it even harder to ignore.

2. The Market-Oriented Headline

A fantastic option that can help you make far more sales and get far more responses. The reason is that the headline is about them — in their own "world" — it speaks to their pain or insecurity, pulling their attention in.

Here's how it can sound for a tutoring center:

> Warning: Don't read this if you still think your teenager is "just lazy" about school.

3. The Emotional Headline

This is one of my personal favorites — one I use regularly. And it too comes from market research and knowing what your audience fears and wants.

Just like the market-oriented headline, this one contains no claims.

> "Attention: Don't read this if you're not absolutely disgusted and sick to your stomach of yet another weight-loss diet."

4. The Straightforward Product Offer Headline

> Get Our Exclusive "Irresistible Offer" Template Pack and the "How to Craft an Irresistible Offer" Video Tutorial — all for just $49.

If the offer is genuinely juicy, it makes sense to lead with it right at the top. Keep in mind that this sales page is being shown to your subscribers — people who already know something about you and your product. So the odds of this working are quite high.

5. The Contrast Headline

Contrast headlines are hard to ignore because they hit the brain directly through its sense of curiosity.

In the world of copywriting, the genius of this type is considered to be Mel Martin. Check out his headlines for yourself. They completely ignore logic — yet they sell like crazy.

> "How to Lose Weight by Eating More of These Fatty Foods."

> "Win at the Races by Picking the Losers."

> "Why Copying Great Golfers Can Ruin Your Game"

> "The Insurance Everyone Buys But Nobody Needs"

> "The Diets That Make You Fatter"

6. The Tabloid Headline

Tabloids are a type of media that specializes in sensational, scandalous, and often exaggerated news. Tabloid headlines are characterized by:

1. Boldness and emotional charge: tabloid headlines aim to grab readers' attention with vivid, emotionally loaded language that can exaggerate or even distort real events.

2. Focus on personal life: tabloids often zero in on the private lives of celebrities, scandals and gossip — rather than serious news.
3. Sensationalism: tabloid headlines often contain shocking, dramatic, or even outlandish claims designed to hook readers.

Overall, tabloid headlines are aimed at emotional impact rather than objective, balanced reporting. Tabloids are notorious for their tendency toward exaggeration and even fabrication in the name of grabbing attention.

My personal favorite of this type belongs to a sales letter by the legendary John Carlton — which, according to him, ran in popular golf magazines for eight years.

The headline read:

> "Amazing Secret Discovered by One-Legged Golfer Adds 50 Yards to Your Drives, Eliminates Hooks and Slices, and Shaves Up to 10 Strokes from Your Game Almost Overnight!"

As you can see, if you remove the "one-legged golfer" from this headline, it becomes completely ordinary...

7. The Curiosity Headline

I already mentioned Mel Martin. He was the king of these irresistible curiosity-builders.

Here are some of his — they stoke curiosity so powerfully that the reader simply cannot stop reading:

> "What You Should Never Eat on an Airplane."

> "Bills You Can Pay Late."

> "How to Outwit a Mugger in an Automatic Elevator."

> "How to Get a Refund on Your Airline Ticket When They Say It's Impossible."

Notice all the twists — pure, raw curiosity.

8. The Direct Benefit Headline

Here you make a flat-out statement of benefit. These headlines don't work quite as well as they might have back when advertising was still a novelty. But they can still work if you're solving a serious, pressing problem.

Here's an example:

> Learn to attract new clients 4x more effectively from cold traffic than the market average — using a single simple text message.

9. The Question Headline

Simple enough. Take your audience's core problem and turn it into a question:

> Can you really lose 15 pounds in two weeks without restricting what you eat?

Notice how, if you turn this headline into a statement:

> Lose 15 pounds in two weeks without restricting what you eat.

It becomes far less effective and just comes across as irritating. But framed as a question, it sparks curiosity. Which is exactly what we're after.

10. The Objection Headline

Just as simple. Drop your target audience's core objection into the headline — and it becomes instantly compelling.

> Is this new diet really as good as they say — or is it just another scam?

11. The "Mix and Match" Headline

Here you blend and combine elements from the previous ten headline types. The more of these you write, the more naturally they'll come to you — and the better your results will be. Practice is everything.

For headlines, I'll give you a more detailed prompt — because this part of your sales copy really must be nailed.

AI PROMPT

Here's the task: write a sales page.

I'm going to give you a very thorough audience analysis right now. Study it carefully. Then we'll write the sales page block by block together. You'll pull all the data from the audience analysis.

When writing the headlines, use these instructions [insert the headlines-for-sales-copy block].

Also, for best results, use the formulas below where they make sense.

FORMULAS:

- [number] ways [avatars] achieve [primary goal]
- Secrets every [avatar] needs to know to [secondary goal]
- How to achieve [primary goal] without [pain/obstacle]
- "It took me [number] [time units] to prove: this works for any [avatar]"
- The only [niche]-method that outperforms what's promised
- What everyone needs to know about [topic]
- How to [verb] [promise] and avoid [pain]
- Why this "[niche]-guru" is giving away [bonus value] in bonuses (ends [deadline])
- Struggling with [consequence]? Here's the solution.
- This [method/approach] gives [avatars] [primary goal]
- Now [avatars] can get [benefit] in just [short time]
- [Adjective] and [adjective] [key phrase/description] that deliver [promised result]
- Who else wants [desired outcome]?
- The secret of [smart way to reach goal]
- Little-known ways to [smart way to reach goal]
- The method already helping [avatars] achieve [primary goal]
- How to eliminate [problem] once and for all
- Now you can [primary goal] without dealing with [objection]
- What everyone needs to know about [niche] right now
- "Give me [short time] and I'll give you [desired result]"

- The easy way for [avatar] to achieve [primary goal]
- Do you recognize [number] early signs of [topic/danger]?
- See how easy it is to [desired result]
- You don't need to be [difficult skill/status] to get [result]
- How these strategies from [niche] helped me achieve [post-result]
- If you have [minimum requirement], you can reach [huge goal]

Instructions:

Act as a professional direct-response copywriter who loves using vivid, lively, simple yet layered language. Write two variations of each headline type from the instructions above. Pull context data from the attached document.

From the headlines you receive, you can choose the most interesting ones and ask for improvements — repeat this a few times. You can also ask to merge some headlines together. That's when things really start to pop.

Optional Refinement Prompt #1

AI PROMPT

You are a professional direct-response copywriter. Rewrite each of the headlines above, adding rich, vivid examples within the headline itself. Don't invent avatars. Keep it universal. Just develop each example a little further using "volumetric" language.

Optional Refinement Prompt #2

AI PROMPT

You are a professional direct-response copywriter. Rewrite each of the headlines above, but push the "dimensionality" of the text even further within the headlines themselves. Be more inventive with how you use them. Make every headline mysterious and irresistible enough that the reader can't help but read on.

You can run this prompt multiple times and cherry-pick the best results. Polish it through iteration.

7 Compelling "Openers" for Your Sales Letters

Now we move to the second part of the five-step sales page formula — the opening paragraph. This is the second most important part of the entire ad.

I once read the following explanation from John Carlton:

> "The headline grabs the attention of the potential buyer — and then the opening paragraph gets them to settle in, feel comfortable, and be ready to read your ad."

In other words:

The headline captures their attention; the opening paragraph locks it in. That's why, if you nail your opening paragraph, the reader will be primed and ready to absorb whatever information you give them. Below are 7 proven and compelling opening paragraph templates.

Opening Paragraph #1: "Let Me Tell You a Story"

My "old faithful" opener — there's nothing simpler than starting your sales copy with the words: "Let me tell you a story."

I use it in sales letters and emails alike. Nothing beats it for simplicity.

So if you write a great headline, follow it with "Let me tell you a story," and then actually start telling a compelling story (see the next chapter) — without trying to be clever or cool — your sales page has a strong chance of being read all the way through and, ultimately, putting money in the bank.

Opening Paragraph #2: "If/Then"

Gary Halbert used this device almost constantly. If you study his ads (and you absolutely should), you'll see him using it over and over again.

> If you want to quickly double your sales without using anything other than free posts on your favorite social media platform, then this letter will show you exactly how to do it.

The formula is:

Core desire of the target audience + secondary desire (optional) + without the target audience's core pain

Opening Paragraph #3: "If/Then" (with proof)

I already talked about how powerful proof-based headlines are. The same applies here.

> If you want to quickly double your sales without using anything other than free posts written using Method XXX — the method that brought me a hundred million in profit — then this letter will show you exactly how to do it.

(Just so you know, I made this headline up on the spot — it's completely detached from reality.)

Opening Paragraph #4: "Brutal and Outrageous Honesty"

Brutal honesty — especially in an industry where no one is honest — can build trust faster than almost anything else. This is where you acknowledge the shortcomings of what you're selling. Many copywriters stupidly try to hide and downplay the negatives. But the far better move is to go the opposite direction.

A classic example is the famous ad by Ernest Shackleton. In the early 1900s, he was a well-known explorer. He published a short ad that read:

> "Men wanted for a hazardous journey, small wages, bitter cold, long months of complete darkness, constant danger, safe return doubtful, honor and recognition in case of success."

Here's an example from a Gary Halbert diet ad:

> "My name is Betty Adams, and the first thing you need to know about me is that I'm not a doctor. I'm also not a nutrition expert. I've never been to college and I have no degree of any kind. In fact, the only thing I consider myself an expert in is..."

And here's my own version of an opener:

> Yes, this letter is a straight-up pitch...

Opening Paragraph #5: "Sensational"

This opener is from the same family as the tabloid headline.

> Let me tell you a true story about a man who got arrested because of a health problem.

Opening Paragraph #6: "Ask a Question"

Just as with headlines, a question about something your potential buyer cares about instantly lights up the neural circuitry in their head and locks in their attention. That's why asking a question in your opening paragraph can earn you immediate interest and engagement.

Here's an opening paragraph I found in a book compiled by Gary Halbert — and it's executed brilliantly:

> "Did you know that long-term returns on baseball cards outperform stocks, T-bills, and rare coins?"

In my opinion, an opener like that will work hypnotically on anyone involved in investing who's right now looking for new income streams.

And one more little opener as a bonus.

Opening Paragraph #7: "Would You Take Advice From...?"

This one is also connected to the previous question-based opener. Here, you ask whether your reader would take advice from someone they'd normally avoid like the plague. And the more outrageous and dramatic you make it, the better.

Here's an example written by John Carlton:

> "Would you take investment advice from a drug dealer? Stupid question, right? Don't be so quick to decide. Because I have a true story for you that plays out straight out of 'The Godfather.'"

To wrap up this section, I want to give you one important warning: don't copy mindlessly. Add uniqueness to your copy. To every part of it. Stand out — don't just clone what someone else did. Do that, and you'll find happiness in your soul and plenty of money in your pocket.

Moving on.

The Story That Sells

We move to the third step of the five-step sales page formula: the story.

In my view, the ability to tell stories is the number one skill in sales — and beyond. The reason is that we think in stories. When someone is told a story, they automatically immerse themselves in its context.

So if you tell a story that resonates with your potential client, they won't be able to stop reading.

And stories are beautiful for another reason too — they don't just teach. They entertain the reader at the same time. And that one fact alone adds tremendous value to your copy.

Our brains want information delivered as a story. And most importantly — the brains of your potential clients are hungry to be sold to through stories!

There are five types of stories I use for selling, and all of them are "beginner-friendly" — it doesn't matter whether you're just starting out in copywriting or you've been doing it for 20–30 years. You can use any one of these five methods, or all of them together. They're not the only five ways. But I'm a fan of simplicity, and these five work extremely well — for me and for everyone I've taught them to.

So let's dig in, starting with...

Story Method #1: "The Story About You"

This is the first and probably the most obvious method.

You simply tell a story about something that happened to you — something related to your product — and tie it to what you're selling. If you've ever read an ad about how someone started a business or how they found a solution to a difficult problem, you've already seen how this is done.

Story Method #2: "Someone Else's Story"

In some ways, this is the easiest story to tell — especially for entrepreneurs who find it hard to sell their products and services because they dislike writing in the first person or feel uncomfortable doing it.

Telling someone else's story takes that problem off the table.

Plus, it gives you far more material to work with.

The reason is that you can go to all kinds of forums, blog comment sections, social media pages — read biographies, popular entertainment shows — and find stories everywhere that you can use to sell your product or service.

You can gather stories from anyone — especially from people in the market you're selling to. Stories written in their language, describing the problem they face in exactly the way they talk about it with each other. That's precisely why they can be so convincing.

But a word of warning:

Don't copy, paste, or plagiarize someone else's story word for word.

Instead, write something like:

> "I heard about a guy who had the exact same problem you have. Here's what happened to him, and here's how he solved it..."

Here's an example of a story I once used on a sales page — with this exact method.

A few weeks ago, I received a letter from a reader of my blog:

“This summer I spent my vacation at my mother-in-law’s country house.

Instead of lounging under a palm tree with a glass of something cold in my hand.

I was giving free advice to her neighbors, her chickens and her turkeys.

On practically every marketing course I’ve taken, they promised me that attracting clients is easy! They promised me I’d be sitting in the Maldives, raking in cash with a shovel.

All I had to do was what they told me: write posts, shoot Reels, build chatbots for Messenger, and a whole bunch of other stuff…

And I do all of it!

But I’m not raking in anything.

Maybe there’s something wrong with my shovel? Maybe I need a different kind?

I’m not a salesperson and I don’t want to spend most of my life on this stuff. But through agony, blood, sweat, and tears, I sit down and write yet another stupid Reel or whatever else makes me want to crawl out of my skin. But I absolutely have to do it, because if I don’t, new clients won’t come, they won’t bring me money, I won’t pay my damn mortgage, and I won’t be able to buy my kids clothes for the summer.

It’s infuriating!

Infuriating because I can’t figure out how to make clients come to me consistently, without any stress on my end. Not just come — but line up for me.

So I can just sit and do what I love. Specifically — do what I’m genuinely good at. And not constantly worry about where my next paycheck is coming from.

I’m constantly doing things to attract new clients.

> Buying yet another course, hoping that this time it'll finally work. And I'm terrified that all of it is for nothing, and I'm just a failure who was never meant for anything better. And when I die, no one will even remember that there was this one expert who actually did something useful and meaningful for people... And I so badly want to be remembered..."

As you can see, I write in the language of my audience and describe all the problems and pain points that they care about.

Story Method #3: "The Dramatized Story About Someone Else"

This method of telling a story is simply a way of telling a "parable." Parables are stories about someone else — but dramatized (i.e., fictional). Parables are extraordinarily persuasive.

Stories like these have launched entire religions! For example, Jesus delivered all his teachings through parables.

I constantly collect parables that I think can be used for selling. At any moment I can open that file and pull out the right one.

Story Method #4: "The Historical Story"

I love using these kinds of stories in sales letters, emails — anywhere I can use them. First of all, the story has already been written — it's already done for you. On top of that, history is packed with real stories, millions upon millions of them, and the saying "truth is stranger than fiction" is absolutely accurate.

Just like with parables, I keep a dedicated file of historical stories. I even specifically read historical literature and note down everything interesting and useful.

Story Method #5: "The Guru Introduction"

This is a great way to tell a story about yourself (or someone else) without the risk of it coming across as fake or self-aggrandizing.

"The Guru Introduction" is a device used in many kung fu movies.

Essentially, it's a variation on the classic tale of a person who wants to meet an old wise guru on top of a lonely mountain — and must go through all kinds of pain and suffering to get there. Then the guru passes on his knowledge for that person to share with the rest of the world.

It works brilliantly for several reasons.

First, it removes any hint of bragging from the text.

Second, since it's not about you but about the guru you learned from, you borrow his authority. This is especially valuable for new business owners who have no established brand, no testimonials, and no track record of their own to lean on.

A perfect example is Robert Kiyosaki:

His bestseller Rich Dad Poor Dad — along with his other books — is built on what he learned from his "rich dad." That was his guru, the one he learned from. And everything he teaches us comes from the guru, not from himself.

These five ways to tell a story are more than enough to write a great piece of sales copy with ease.

But there's one "BUT."

When telling stories, keep in mind the famous quote from sales genius Jim Camp:

> "You will always be safe when you are in the other person's world."

This means only one thing: tell stories that are interesting to your reader.

I recommend writing both the story and the opening paragraph yourself. No AI. The most you can ask it to do is add some texture or polish the final text.

You can also voice-record your story, transcribe it, and send the transcription to AI for processing — so it turns your raw dictation into a solid story.

Next, we need to...

Pack Your Ad Full of Irresistible "Bullets."

We move to the fourth part of the perfect sales page — the so-called "bullets." Writing bullets is the most important writing element of your sales copy.

This is probably the #1 skill you need to develop.

The thing is, even your headline is really nothing more than a version of your best bullet.

The more bullets you have, the more sales you'll likely make — provided, of course, you've done your homework, know what the market needs, and have gone deep on your product.

It's not uncommon for the best copywriters to write their bullets first — and spend a huge amount of time on them — knowing that just one bullet that resonates with the reader's goals is enough to make the sale.

That's how important they are.

One of the reasons they're so powerful — aside from the fact that they "trigger curiosity" (and I've already talked about how potent curiosity is) — is that they're short, easy to read and digest, and when written well, they cut straight to the soul.

The topic of "how to write killer bullets" is so vast that it deserves its own book. So here, we'll stick to examples.

- How to create an almost instant impression of you and your product in your sales copy — even if you're just starting out and only your mom, your girlfriend, and her cat know who you are.
- How to use competitor product and service reviews to sell your own products.
- The intelligence-agency memory training technique that can make potential buyers dream about the product you're selling — and sometimes lie awake at night thinking about it and your offer.

- A surprisingly strange (but super-effective) way to sell insanely expensive products using just one or two sentences!
- How to make even the most outrageous and far-fetched claims sound 100% believable.
- The secret of "bragging without bragging" in a sales letter (it can be spotted in many old kung fu films) — which lets you boast about your products, services, or yourself without coming across as an arrogant jerk.
- The old American door-to-door salesman tactic that can make people want to buy a product they didn't even want to hear about at first.
- The method of the infamous late comedian — used in his stand-up routines to grab attention — that can automatically make your sales copy more believable, more interesting, and... less "sales-y."
- The secret of the world's most feared negotiator (who closed billion-dollar deals) for making your sales letters gripping, irresistible, and genuinely enjoyable to read.
- The secret to writing headlines in the style of the 1960s show Mad Men that will make people eagerly read every single word of your sales copy.
- How to open your sales copy so you slip right past the reader's built-in sales defense shield.
- The best emotion to focus on in advertising. (Some people are motivated by greed... some by fear... others by anger, envy, lust, or pride. But this emotion is a total cannon for sales — it dramatically increases the likelihood that your sales copy gets read, taken seriously, and... that you get paid.)
- How to draw people toward buying through your sales letters without making any real claims whatsoever.

Here's one more ultra-detailed prompt. Because bullets are critical for sales — and creating them as a beginner with no experience is extremely difficult.

Close the Sale Like a Champion

You have your headline, your opening paragraph, your story, and your bullets...

Now it's time for the fifth and final part of the perfect sales page — which is to close the deal and... collect the money.

This is your main offer. We'll cover it in great detail in a dedicated chapter. Because your offer absolutely must be outstanding. Because it's the offer that ultimately determines whether you make sales or not.

CHAPTER 8

The Technology of Creating Offers: Quite Possibly the Most Definitive Way to Make Your Marketing Generate Leads, Clients, and Cash in the Register

In this chapter, we're talking about the offer — the single most important element in all of marketing.

It's one of the key components of any marketing campaign. Yet, for some reason, it gets less attention and time than almost anything else.

Even though it's the very thing that can make a campaign succeed — or completely tank it.

If you've done everything else brilliantly but your offer is weak — the results will be weak. Or there won't be any results at all.

In reality, the offer accounts for roughly 40% of the success of an entire marketing campaign. Another 40% is the audience you're targeting with the offer.

That is: 40% — audience, 40% — offer, and only the remaining 20% — copywriting, visuals, design, funnel model, automation, and everything else.

First you analyze your audience and select the right segment. That's all standard stuff. And once you've chosen your segment and are confident in it, the OFFER becomes the primary driver of your success.

Most marketers and entrepreneurs spend far too little time on it. Very few people truly work through, plan, and build the right offer. Yet, as I've already said, it's the offer that can either destroy your campaign or supercharge it. And it absolutely will do one or the other.

A well-built offer can raise your conversion rate dramatically. Without changing anything else: no funnel restructuring, no rewriting of copy or messaging, no fancy automation.

Let's go even deeper on this concept.

An offer is everything your potential client receives from you — and everything they need to do or give in order to get it.

It's important to understand that this includes both the pleasant and the unpleasant for the client.

The pleasant side — the product itself, its features and benefits. Plus the "bonuses" and perks that come with it.

The unpleasant side — the risks the client takes on along with the product. Plus the effort and work required to get value out of it. The fact that they need to step outside their comfort zone.

One important point: every marketing campaign is built from the offer outward.

When launching a new campaign, always start by building out the offer. Before you write a single line of copy. Before you come up with a headline.

Because the offer is where you're taking your potential client. It's the end goal of the entire marketing campaign. Everything in the campaign is designed to bring the client to the offer — to make them want it and respond to it.

It's like planning a trip. First you decide where you're going — then you plan the route, the stops, and everything else. Same principle here.

And one more important point: the stronger the offer, the simpler the marketing. A strong offer can compensate for weak marketing. But even the best marketing cannot compensate for a weak offer. A strong offer can carry even an imperfect piece of copy — but the best copy in the world won't save a mediocre offer. That's why we always start with the offer.

The offer is actually what we're promoting and selling. Not the product, not the service — the offer. The product is just one component of the offer.

A complete offer is everything we give the client: the product, its features and delivery, the benefits, the price, the terms, the guarantee, the bonuses. Plus packaging all of that into a bundle — along with variations of that bundle. And removing risk from the client's shoulders. In short — what you're promoting is the offer, not the product.

10 Types of Offers You Can Use and Combine

The first type of offer — the most standard one.

This is the most common, widespread type. It's called a hard offer. This is when the client pays upfront, before getting access to the product. 99.9% of all offers in the marketplace, in the world of commerce, are hard offers. The client must pay first, before receiving the product.

The second type of offer — the soft offer.

This is the opposite of a hard offer: the client gets access to the product or service today, and pays later. Sometimes this means they pay nothing today, and settle the full amount a week, two weeks, 30 days, six months, or even a year later. An entrepreneur needs serious guts to make offers like these — and confidence in their product.

The advantage for the client is that they get to experience the product or service and feel its value before putting any money on the table — or at least most of it.

Simply swapping a hard offer for a soft offer — without changing anything else, no copy, no structure — can radically increase sales. Why? Because we remove all the risk from the client.

We put them in a position where they don't just have to take our word for it. They don't need to fully trust everything we promise — they can try the product for themselves, experience its value firsthand before paying. And it really is a highly effective type of offer.

Soft offers are very popular among various business services. Think: "Connect to our premium package and use it free for 2 weeks to experience everything our service has to offer."

Legendary copywriters like Gary Halbert and Eugene Schwartz built enormous businesses — both for themselves and for their clients — on the foundation of soft offers. They gave people the ability to get the product now and pay later. Gary Halbert even had an offer like this:

> "Send me a check — I won't cash it. Enjoy the product. And only if you like it will I cash the check. If you don't like it — I'll tear it up and send it back to you."

And it worked. I even think that the ability to create soft offers is what made them great — not just the ability to write killer sales copy. But that's my personal opinion, which is most likely correct.

Most entrepreneurs and marketers don't use soft offers because deep down they're afraid their product isn't as good as the ad promises. They're afraid it won't meet expectations, and that most new clients simply won't pay.

But that's a separate conversation — about product quality. What matters right now is this: simply shifting from a hard offer to a soft offer can radically transform your conversion rate.

The third type of offer — simple installments.

This is a standard split-payment scheme. The price might be $2,000, for example. But the terms could offer either a one-time payment of that $2,000, or installments. For instance, four payments of $500. That's a simple installment offer.

The fourth type of offer — the early adopter offer.

This is typically an offer for people who buy a new product, new program, new service, or new software at an early stage. They receive a discount for being first. It's a special offer with a discount for buying early.

The fifth type of offer — the exclusive offer.

This is an offer created specifically for a particular category of people. You might have one offer for new potential clients, and a completely different one for existing clients — people who have already bought from you. You might even create a separate exclusive offer just for your most loyal customers.

And when I say exclusive offer, I don't necessarily mean a discount. It could simply be a different offer: with a different payment structure or different terms. Different bonuses or additional value.

In other words, it doesn't have to mean a lower price at all. Many marketers mistakenly think that the only way to strengthen or improve an offer is to add a discount. That's completely wrong.

I almost never give discounts on my products, because I don't want to devalue them. And I don't want to be unfair to clients who already paid full price.

The sixth type of offer — the limited offer.

This is an offer built on scarcity. Example: "only 500 units," "just 1,000 copies," "only 85 spots at the event," and so on.

The key here is to be honest. Don't use fake scarcity. Nothing is worse than false urgency or artificial scarcity. It can seriously damage your reputation.

For example, you claim you're selling only 80 units — and then you sell 880. That destroys trust. So use limited offers only when the scarcity is real and you can explain why it exists.

The seventh type of offer — the time-limited offer.

This is an offer with a deadline. Here the emphasis is not on quantity, but on urgency. A limited offer is about a limited number; a time-limited offer is about a deadline.

The eighth type of offer — the one-time offer.

This is an offer the client sees only once. For example, on their first visit to your site. In the US, these were quite popular for a while. It's when you buy something for a low price and a pop-up appears with this one-time offer — at an enormous discount. And you really can only get it that one time.

The ninth type of offer — the qualifying offer.

This offer requires filling out an application or completing certain steps. The client needs to "qualify" in order to receive the offer. Fairly self-explanatory.

The tenth type of offer — the combined offer.

This is an offer that incorporates several types at once. It can be both limited by quantity, limited by time, exclusive, and soft — all in one.

For example, you're making a special offer for your best clients. And since they're your best clients, you do it as a soft offer: they get the product immediately and pay only a month later. The offer is only available to the first 100 people who respond. And it's only open for 4 days.

That's a combo: soft offer + exclusive offer + limited offer + time-restricted offer.

And as you can see, combined offers are always the strongest.

Now let's talk about what an offer is actually made of.

The Seven Components of an Offer

Component #1 is the offer content. This is what the potential client actually gets. It's what most entrepreneurs and marketers think of when they talk about an offer. It's the body of the offer: the product or service.

Component #2 is the benefits. A benefit has three layers. But most marketers only focus on the first. Yet all the real power lies in the second and third. More on those below.

Component #3 is the price and terms. Simple: how much the client pays and how — one-time payment, installments, etc.

Component #4 is risk elimination. This can include a money-back guarantee, but it actually goes much deeper. The key insight here is that your potential client perceives several types of risk when considering your offer. Financial risk is only one of them. We use the risk-elimination strategy to minimize as many of those perceived risks as possible.

Component #5 is bonuses. These are the extra goodies that make the offer even more valuable.

Component #6 is the reason why the client should act right now — not tomorrow, not next week, not next month.

Component #7 is the call to action. These are the instructions you give the client so they can take the offer and get all its benefits.

If you do it all right, your offer will be so good, so valuable, so irresistible that it'll be harder for the client to say "no" than "yes."

Ultimately, your job is to get your potential client thinking: "Why not? Seriously, I need to grab this. I'd feel like an idiot if I passed on this deal."

Your goal — and mine too — should be to make offers so powerful, so outstanding, so irresistible and obvious that clients would be willing to crawl on broken glass just to get them.

Do you see how different this mindset is from how the average marketer or entrepreneur thinks?

Here's how they slap together their offer: "Here's my product. Here's the price. Here's how to buy." I'm sure you're not going to do that anymore.

Now, let's go through each component in detail.

Component #1: Content

The content of your offer should always have three parts: what the client gets, a key feature, and why it matters.

Imagine you own a dental clinic and you're selling professional teeth cleaning services.

What does the client get? A cleaning service: removing tartar, polishing away plaque, a care consultation.

The feature. Everything is done with the latest-generation ultrasonic equipment, plus polishing with a specialized paste.

Why does it matter? Because ultrasound gently removes tartar without damaging the enamel, and the polishing doesn't just whiten teeth — it also reduces the risk of plaque buildup in the future.

The formula works for any business.

Auto shop: "oil change" → "on Bosch equipment" → "so your engine lasts longer and doesn't guzzle extra fuel."

Café: "business lunch" → "cooked fresh right in front of you, not reheated" → "you get something hot and fresh, not something zapped in a microwave."

Home repair: "window installation" → "triple-pane insulated glass" → "your apartment stays 30% warmer in winter, and street noise disappears."

Think of it as a three-step formula: we say exactly what the client gets, we name the key feature, and we explain why that feature is valuable.

Important: if there's no compelling reason for the client to care — don't mention it. Don't stuff your marketing with filler.

You're claiming that the offer has certain content, that it has an important and meaningful feature, and you're explaining the value it delivers to the client. If there's no real value there — don't waste your time or theirs. Don't include something in your offer just because I said to.

Component #2: Benefits

What are benefits, and how are they different from features?

A feature is a fact about the product or an element of its content. A benefit is what that fact means for the client. What will change in their life? How will it get better? How will they have less pain, more pleasure, more joy?

A benefit is what changes for the client. A feature is just a fact.

Your offer must clearly show how it delivers the very benefits and desires you've identified.

Because your client is always thinking: "What's in it for me? What will change for me? Why should I care? How will my life get better? Will I have fewer fears? More confidence? More joy? Less pain? Will I feel better? Will I be more attractive, more confident, stronger, freer?"

That's what really matters to the client.

The client doesn't care how many technicians you have on shift, what brand your equipment is, or how old it is. What matters to them is: will they drive away without that rattling noise? Will the faucet stop leaking? Will the AC actually work when it's scorching outside? That's the real benefit.

The client only cares about one thing — the result, the effect, the transformation. And your offer needs to show very clearly how it delivers that result.

Before we move on, there's one critically important thing to clarify: every stated benefit needs proof.

If you say the product is easy to use, you need to back that up. Proof can be a client testimonial, a case study, a recommendation from a credible expert, or a demo video showing how it all works.

It doesn't matter what format you choose — proof is non-negotiable. Without it, your promises are just words. "You'll get this, and this, and that too" — without evidence, none of it lands.

Don't forget: today's clients are extremely skeptical.

Every single day they're bombarded with hundreds of over-the-top promises from ads, the internet, TV, radio, email, billboards. That's exactly why you absolutely must provide proof.

Three Levels of Benefits

Now let's get into the three levels of benefits. This is where things get really important, because this is what your clients actually care about: how their life will specifically change after using your product or service.

Level One — Functional Benefit.

This is what the feature or content of the product does for the client. Let's say you're offering a training program in book format (like this book). I could say: "This marketing course is convenient because you can take it anywhere — on the road, to a café, anywhere without internet. And you can mark the important parts directly in the book, which boosts retention." That's a functional benefit.

Level Two — Visualized (or "Brought to Life") Benefit.

Here you "bring the functional benefit to life" by painting a picture: "Imagine sitting in a café over your morning coffee. While everyone around you is zombified by their phones, you're sitting there like an intellectual, reading a book, jotting down key insights in your notes — ideas you'll implement very soon and turn into a lot of money." You're creating a movie in the client's mind. You're making them see themselves in that moment.

Level Three — Emotional Benefit.

You show the client what they'll feel when they're inside that picture. For example: "Sitting in that café, reading my book, you'll feel confident, inspired, with a sense that you're moving toward financial freedom — toward the future you've been dreaming of for yourself and your family."

The emotional benefit has the greatest impact. It's what people actually want. People buy emotions. They buy to feel safe, confident, attractive, inspired. They're not buying the product — they're buying the feeling of getting the result.

This is one of the most important parts of the offer.

And yet — one of the most frequently ignored. Most marketers and entrepreneurs never get there. They stop at the feature, maybe get as far as describing the functional benefit. But the real power is in the emotion.

Now — let's move on to price and terms.

Component #3: Price

Let me show you a five-step price presentation. I know it looks "infomarkety," but it works incredibly well — always, everywhere. Even when the client knows exactly what you're doing.

1. Present the value: "Total value — $1,000."
2. Name the "regular" price: "This normally sells for $650."
3. Give the reason for the discount: "But right now we have a special promotion for..."
4. Name the promo price: "And you can get this entire package for just $325."
5. Highlight the savings: "You save $675 — that's a 67.5% discount!"

Simple. You walk the client through it step by step: value → regular price → reason for discount → your actual price → amount saved.

The key here is that you're creating a disproportionately favorable value proposition. The gap between the value and the price needs to be wide enough that the client feels like they're getting several times more than they're paying.

And your job is to actually create the value — not just "show" it. Don't inflate numbers artificially. Don't exaggerate. Build your offer so that the real value is genuinely high — and then the retail price will seem reasonable, while the offer price will feel like an absolute steal.

This isn't about seeming valuable. It's about being valuable. It's about being better than your competitors. It's about giving more than they give — in content, in results, in benefits.

Don't copy what everyone else is doing in the market. Don't think: "That's what they all do, so it's fine for me too." "Fine" is the road to mediocre conversion. An offer with genuinely high conversion is built on disproportionately strong value — rooted in something real.

Component #4: Risks

When your potential client looks at the offer and thinks: "Do I actually need this? Maybe I should just forget it?" — their brain is running through every possible risk.

The first and most obvious risk is financial.

The person is afraid they'll hand over money and get a product that doesn't work or is low quality. That they won't get a refund. That returns aren't an option. That they'll just get ripped off. It's a direct, obvious risk. But there are others — just as important.

Fear of losing face.

This is the situation where someone loses the respect of the people around them. They bought something — and now they look like an idiot. Their spouse, colleague, friend, or boss might say: "You didn't even check what you were buying, you fool?" They feel humiliated.

Many marketers overlook this entirely. But clients genuinely think about it. They're not only afraid of losing money — they're afraid of looking stupid. They're afraid of being seen as naive, weak, short-sighted fools.

This fear is just as powerful as the financial risk. And it must be addressed.

Fear of wasting time.

Someone buys an online course and starts using it, but:

- gets no results,

- can't figure it out,

- wastes a ton of time.

Time is gone — with nothing to show for it. That's also a risk.

Risk of inconvenience.

"If I buy your CRM, I'll have to change everything. Change my routine. Train my staff. Rework my processes. Set up new workflows and procedures... That'll take time and effort." This creates resistance before the purchase even happens. The client senses: this is going to be a hassle.

Risk of extra problems and pressure.

"If I buy — here it comes... Calls. Upsell offers. Newsletter subscriptions. Getting buried in promotions. Now I have to talk to someone, jump through hoops just to get the bonuses?" These are the risks of post-purchase pressure. Friction. Bureaucracy.

Risk of disappointing results.

This is when someone doesn't get the result they were expecting. They bought it because they wanted to save their business. Or achieve personal growth. Or help their company cut costs. But the result never came. And that's a blow not just to their wallet — but to their self-esteem and reputation.

So in summary, the client may be experiencing:

- fear of losing money;
- fear of looking stupid;
- fear of wasting time;
- fear of inconvenience;
- fear of pressure and being hounded;
- fear of disappointing results.

Your job is to know all of these fears and embed elements into your offer that dissolve them.

All of these risks are real. You need to understand that they live in the client's head, and you need to know how to work with them.

What do you need to do?

First, rank these risks by how important they are to the client. Which ones matter most, and which are secondary? Is the fear of being deceived the biggest? Losing face comes second? And, say, inconvenience is last? Put them in priority order.

Second, ask yourself: how do I remove each of these risks from the client's mind?

Financial risk? Easy — a money-back guarantee.

Losing face? What can you do to make sure they don't look foolish in front of the people they care about?

Wasting time? Add a bonus — for example, someone who will come and set everything up for the client.

Risk of inconvenience? Make it clear that the client won't receive a single call, won't be added to any lists or databases, and nobody will bother them.

And if the fear is getting a result they're disappointed with? Then your guarantee could sound like this: "If within 5 days you're not satisfied, I'll get on a plane, fly to your office, and work as your personal consultant until you get results." Bold, yes. Scary, yes. But incredibly powerful.

Your goal is to build an offer that eliminates as many real client fears as possible. Not just the financial ones — all of them. Make it genuinely risk-free. Not as a formality. In substance.

So what exactly is "risk elimination"?

At its core, it's the strongest and boldest guarantee you can possibly make. We need to offer the best, most audacious, most jaw-dropping guarantee we can come up with.

And here's what you need to understand: your priority in sales is not to minimize returns. Your priority is to maximize sales.

Yes, if we're bold and offer a double-money-back guarantee, we'll get more returns. That's fine. But we'll also get far more sales. And almost always, the increase in sales will outpace the increase in returns.

If you knew that returns would go up by 10%, but your conversion to sale would increase by 20% — would you go for it? The answer is: you should. Because your job is to sell.

If the increase in returns is smaller than the increase in sales, you're ahead. So that's exactly what you should be doing — every single day, without hesitation. Your goal is to drive conversion up, not to keep your return rate as close to zero as possible.

Legendary copywriter Gary Halbert once said:

> "If you don't have at least 10% returns — you're not selling aggressively enough. That means you're not a marketer, you're just being timid."

Your goal is the highest possible conversion rate, not "nearly zero returns." And the first step toward that is a shamelessly stacked offer, including an audacious guarantee. Do things that make your competitors' jaws drop.

EXAMPLES:

- Refund your money and let you keep the product.

- Pay back double what you paid.

- Refund your money, let you keep the product, and send you a $100 Amazon gift card.

Risk elimination is part of the offer. The stronger it is, the higher your conversion. And here's a benchmark for evaluating your offer:

If your own offer makes you a little uncomfortable — you're on the right track. If it doesn't scare you at all — your competitor can do the exact same thing. But if your offer makes your knees shake and leaves your competitors in shock — you're close to a truly powerful offer.

Component #5: Bonuses

Many entrepreneurs and marketers add bonuses to their offers as an afterthought.

In the info-business world, it tends to look something like this: "What do I have lying around on my hard drive?" They think the magic is in simply having bonuses. That if you just throw in one or two — three max — your offer is "done."

No.

The quality of the bonuses, how attractive they are, what problem they solve, what secret they reveal, what value they bring — that's what matters.

The goal is to offer bonuses that feel more valuable than the main product itself. Goodies that make the client's mouth water. Perks that alone would be worth buying for, even if there were no main product.

That's how you need to think.

Never start with: "What do I have lying around that I don't need?" Start with: "What can I give that will make the client go absolutely wild?"

What can you add that makes someone say: “I would buy this just for THAT bonus”?

What can you give on top of the product to: overcome an objection, eliminate a fear, add a desired benefit? That’s exactly how to approach bonuses.

When developing your bonuses, start by listing all the “gaps” and “excuses” the client might come up with. What reasons will they tell themselves not to buy? What might make them feel like something’s unresolved in your offer?

Here’s an example I saw at a Russell Brunson sales webinar.

He was selling access to his ClickFunnels platform. And his bonuses were:

1. Don’t have a product? Here are 10,000 product options you can sell — for FREE. You’ll find all of them inside my platform.
2. Don’t have a funnel? Here are 5,000 templates of proven funnels. Just pick one you like, add your product name and connect your payment details. You get landing pages, sales pages, and follow-up emails — the whole package. You don’t have to build anything yourself. No need to pay $20K for development and implementation. Take it — FREE. All of these templates are waiting for you on my platform.
3. You’re a complete beginner and don’t even know how to drive traffic? Well, here’s my book on how to do exactly that. Take it — also FREE.

He gave genuinely incredible bonuses, each one designed to overcome a specific objection.

There were actually about 10 bonuses in total. And each one addressed one or more possible objections. That’s truly masterclass-level stuff.

Sell the bonus — don't just toss it in.

Including a bonus isn't enough — you need to explain why you've included each one. Sell every bonus just as powerfully as you sell the main product:

- What is the bonus?

- What are its features?

- Why does it matter?

- What functional and emotional benefits does it deliver?

In short, describe each bonus in just as much detail as you described your main product.

A few additional principles:

1. The more bonuses, the better.
2. If the main product doesn't deliver instant gratification — provide that through a bonus. For example, if a coaching program starts in a week, include something in the bonuses that can be used right away. So the client feels value from your product today.
3. You can include quirky, "random" bonuses — a mug, a t-shirt, a photo on the cover of a made-up magazine. Yes, it sounds weird. But it works. Because it creates an emotion, adds uniqueness, and delivers that "oh wow, that's so cool" effect.

Especially if you make it personal. A mug with the client's name on it, for instance. Or a funny slogan. It boosts conversion. Works especially well for high-ticket products.

And finally — the false close.

This is a technique from late-night TV shopping. It's when it seems like you're wrapping up: you've given the price, talked through the bonuses, given the reason to act now... and then — out of nowhere: "But wait, there's more!"

The client feels like the final call to action is coming. But instead, you drop another bonus, another "gift." That extra bonus shouldn't be just a throwaway — it should be good enough to get the client's pulse racing all over again, adding that "this just keeps getting better" feeling. This is the moment to push those who were almost ready but still on the fence over the edge.

Component #6: The Reason to Act Now

Remember this: a delayed decision = a dead sale. Any pause, any "I'll think about it later" reduces the likelihood of a purchase. Every second after the offer is presented where the client hasn't bought yet is a second pulling them further away from buying.

That's why in every offer we add two elements that create a reason to act now:

1. Urgency

This is usually built around a deadline. Whenever possible, always add a deadline:

- Promotion runs for 4 days

- Bonuses expire Friday

- Registration window closes end of the week

Beyond a formal deadline, you can tie urgency to circumstances in the client's own world. For example, if you're selling coaching services, you could say that every day of delay is another day of being stuck where you are — another day of missed opportunity. (That's a joke, by the way — I made that up on the fly. Don't actually write like that. Write ethically.)

The point is, this isn't just a marketing deadline. It's real urgency tied to something happening in the client's world.

A deadline + urgency rooted in an external event = maximum impulse to act.

2. Scarcity

Urgency and scarcity are two different things. Urgency is “time is running out.” Scarcity is “the product might run out.” And scarcity actually hits harder psychologically than urgency.

Why? Because if there are still 3 days until the deadline, you can take your time. But if there are only 5 units left — they could be gone any moment. So if you’re using a deadline, don’t make it 21 or 30 days. That kills the sense of urgency. 3-5 days is the maximum.

Scarcity can come in different forms:

- limited number of bundles,

- limited quantity of bonuses,

- limited type of conditions (for example, “only for the first 15 buyers today”).

Important: the scarcity must be real and believable. Fake scarcity is a fast track to losing trust.

You can combine them: urgency (deadline on Friday) + scarcity (only 50 bundles available). Or: urgency: “Program starts in 48 hours” + scarcity: “Only 10 spots for a live session with the coach.” That kind of combination is maximum-strength.

Don’t forget — every restriction needs a logical reason behind it.

- Why is the discount limited?

- Why are there only 50 bundles left?

- Why are you only giving the bonus to the first 15?

The client needs to believe the reasons — otherwise they’ll see right through it as a trick.

And we’re not building tricks. We’re building offers that are impossible to refuse.

So, if you don’t give people a reason to act right now — they’ll put it off. And delay is the death of the sale. The client needs to feel urgency and motivation in the very moment they see your offer. When you bring it all together — urgency, deadline, scarcity — you get the most powerful "action trigger" possible.

Component #7: Call to Action

Don't assume the client will figure out what to do next on their own. Tell them clearly and specifically what they need to do to take you up on the offer and get the result.

And — connect the action to a future positive outcome. Talk not about the process ("download the PDF"), but about the transformation ("get peace of mind and clarity in your tasks").

Not "click and get 2 bags of grass seed." But: "Click and in 30 days enjoy a thick, lush lawn that makes your neighbors jealous." (I couldn't resist — had to use that tired lawn example.)

And one more powerful technique.

Amplifying the consequences of inaction.

Don't be afraid to remind the client what happens if they do nothing. For example:

"There's no reason to keep putting up with a sad, embarrassing lawn. Don't expect it to fix itself. Grab our premium grass seed and within a month enjoy the yard you've always dreamed of."

You're creating contrast:

- the current painful situation (sad lawn),

- versus the prospect (lush green),

- and the risk of staying "as is" (nothing will change).

Finish with a crystal-clear call to action:

"Click the green button below. You'll be taken to a secure order form. Fill in your details, click 'Submit' — and within a few days your seed kit will arrive. And 45 days later, you'll be proudly looking out at the lawn of your dreams."

That's it. Now you know how to build your incredibly powerful offer. The ball is in your court. Take everything you just learned — and start applying it in your funnels, products, and campaigns.

If you begin every marketing campaign by building out a solid offer, if you make your proposals as bold as possible, you will multiply your sales many times over — without changing anything else in your marketing.

And now, the prompt.

AI PROMPT

You are an offer strategist and marketing architect with 15 years of experience, doubling and quadrupling conversion rates without changing the funnel. You've launched 100+ offers in [your niche/market], achieving conversions up to 10% and LTV growth of 20%. Your superpower is building irresistible combo offers, eliminating risk, and turning skeptics into buyers.

Action:

1. Build a powerful offer, strictly following the "Offer Creation Guide" I've attached (you'll need to attach the full text of Chapter 8). Don't summarize the guide — apply its principles to my inputs.
2. Focus on my audience segment and desired outcome. Eliminate risks, amplify value, and add reasons to act now.
3. Deliver a RESULTS PACKAGE: a) Offer core (1-2 sentences) + 3 variations by type: soft, limited, combined — or whatever best fits my situation.

b) Breakdown of the "7 Offer Components" applied to my case: content → benefits (functional, visualized, emotional) → price/terms → risk elimination → bonuses → reason to act now (urgency/scarcity) → call to action.

c) Pricing via the 5-step presentation: "value → regular price → reason for discount/terms → offer price → highlighted savings" — with actual numbers.

d) Risk elimination plan: what fears does my segment have, and exact wording for the guarantees/processes that dissolve them.

e) Bonus stack (minimum 5 bonuses), each one “sold”: what it is, its features, why it matters, what benefits it delivers / what objections it overcomes.

f) Reasons to act now: 2–3 urgency scenarios + 2–3 scarcity scenarios with believable explanations.

g) CTA blocks (3 versions): short, medium, extended — connect the action to the desired transformation.

h) 14-day A/B plan: what we’re testing (offer type, price/terms, guarantee, bonus stack), success metrics (CR click → lead → purchase, CPL, CPA, installment take-rate, return rate), decision priorities.

Write specifically and with numbers/ranges where I’ve provided them. Where there are no numbers — suggest realistic ranges and flag them [verify/replace].

Don’t default to discounts — offer alternatives for increasing value (terms, bonuses, risk reversal).

Format:

Deliver a structured document with clear headers and lists. Add a micro-rationale “why this boosts conversion” in 1-2 sentences for each point. Mark placeholders in [square brackets] so I can quickly fill them in.

Tone:

Confident, practical, no fluff. A steady business style with a slight edge and results-orientation.

Pull my inputs from the target audience analysis document (attach the file with the audience analysis and description):

That’s really all there is to it. I’ve laid out everything you need for successful promotion in detail. But I’d like to share a few more secret tricks that will definitely come in handy.

CHAPTER 9

11 Silver Bullets of the Entrepreneur's Secret Weapon

Bullet #1. Be Crystal Clear

This is a trap that fresh-faced marketers fall into all the time — the ones who've devoured all the smart marketing books telling them that the main goal of advertising is to grab attention.

Yes, grabbing attention is important. But you need to grab the attention of your specific target audience — not everyone and anyone. And the goal isn't just to grab attention — it's to deliver your marketing message without distortion. So that the potential client understands exactly what you meant to say. That's what increases your chances of making a sale.

Here's an example of confusing advertising:

Picture a billboard: a stern-looking man staring straight at you, a phone number — and nothing else.

What were they trying to say with this message? Who is that man on the ad?

Does this ad grab attention? Yes. The menacing expression on the banner triggers subconscious unease, and your conscious mind registers it. But is it clear?

Not at all.

It's actually an ad from the HR department of a manufacturing company. They're trying to recruit new staff with this message.

Did it work? I have serious doubts.

So next time you come up with a new ad message or offer, test it on people you know who have no idea what you do. Ask them what they understood from your message.

It doesn't need to be creative or clever. It needs to be crystal clear to your target audience.

Period.

Bullet #2. Be Bold — Ask for the Sale Right Now

There was a widely known speaker in the world of motivation and sales named Zig Ziglar. The godfather of all sales motivators and the like. By all accounts, a seriously sharp guy.

His signature line went like this: "Timid salespeople have skinny kids."

The message: just go out there and sell — stop overthinking it.

So many entrepreneurs are as shy as wallflowers when it comes to offering their services. They're simply afraid.

They talk about how great they are, how amazing their product is. But they don't sell. They're hoping the client will take the initiative and ask about services and pricing on their own.

But here's the thing...

Your clients are just as shy as you are. They're just as uncomfortable asking about the price as you are about bringing it up. Or they simply don't realize that what you've been doing all along isn't just telling them about yourself and your product — you've actually been trying to sell to them with everything you've got.

So next time you're presenting yourself and your product, make sure you spell out your offer, explain crystal clearly what makes you different from everyone else in the market, and simply ask them to buy from you.

Yes, just say it straight out: "Here's my incredible product — and I'm inviting you to buy it from me right now. Don't even think about leaving without it."

Bullet #3. Niche Down

No matter how many times I share this principle with people, they're very reluctant to follow it. And I completely understand them. Because from the outside, it can look like pure madness.

Take a psychologist, for example. They work with everyone on every issue, thinking that covering more ground means a bigger market — and therefore more money.

But that's not how it works. When you work with everyone on everything, you become generic. You have no unique offer. It becomes unclear why anyone should come to you specifically — except maybe because your prices are low.

The result: either very few new clients (most common), or lots of clients but very little money (it happens, but less often).

The best way out is to niche down.

If that same psychologist said to themselves and to the market: "I work exclusively with entrepreneurs who are burned out by heavy workloads and don't know how to take back control of their lives" — a lot would change for them very quickly.

From that alone, you can build a solid offer and stand out in the market. People would come to them for a specific problem. Over time, working only in that niche, they'd become the best in it. They'd become the #1. And that's no longer $30 an hour. That's $150. Or $2,000.

Agree — that's a pretty great prospect!

The key is to choose a niche where money actually exists, and not one that's too narrow. Use your common sense!

And yes, I used a service-based example here, but manufacturing businesses can and should segment themselves too.

Bullet #4. Be Ready for the Client Not to Believe You

There's a pretty cynical joke.

A dad puts his three-year-old son on a table and coaxes him to jump. "Come on, son, jump — I'll catch you," he promises. After a lot of convincing, the son jumps. And the dad steps back, letting the kid hit the floor, and says: "That was your first big lesson in life — don't trust anyone."

So here's the thing.

Your potential client has already been convinced to jump off that table many times before. They jumped, and they scraped their knees bloody. Now you've got to start from scratch and get them to trust again — to jump.

Do you think that's easy?

Not even close.

That's why "my product is amazing," "you'll feel fantastic," and "it'll solve all your problems" don't work.

Your client needs iron-clad, logical, believable proof from you. And not 2-3 pieces — try 10 or 20. There shouldn't just be enough — there should be an abundance.

And every piece of logical proof needs to be backed by facts, statistics, testimonials, and case studies.

If you say something yourself — it's a claim. When one of your happy clients says the same thing about you — it becomes a fact.

Only by operating with facts will you be able to convince the client to "jump off the table." And at that point, it's on you not to drop the ball — you absolutely have to catch them with caring hands and not let them "scrape their knees" again.

Bullet #5. Maintain Consistency of Image

This one is multifaceted.

The core idea is that nothing should give a person pause when buying your product, and their entire journey from first contact to purchase should feel logical and coherent.

Hypothetical Example #1

You walk into an office that offers real estate services. They tell you everything is great. Clients are flooding in. Every deal closes like clockwork. They'll find you a new apartment and sell your old one in a day, easy.

Except — while you're there, the phone never rings once, and none of their managers make a single call. All the computers are off. The receptionist is buried in their phone, never looking up.

It's obvious that the success story they're painting has absolutely nothing to do with reality.

Although, maybe you just wandered in on their day off and on a regular workday it's buzzing. (Doubtful.)

Hypothetical Example #2

You see a bright, eye-catching ad for a new massage salon. You check their website, social media, client reviews, specialist reviews. Everything looks great — you're impressed. And the offer is strong: "Book a two-hour full-body massage. Complimentary glass of champagne."

You book. You show up. And inside: peeling walls, broken chairs, and a smell of mold. A total nightmare.

That completely shatters your mood, your desire for a massage, and any wish to drink champagne. You bail and from that point on ignore every call and message from that salon.

These are abstract examples. But the point I want to make is: your offer and reality must match. Don't deceive anyone or create expectations that clash with the truth.

And that applies to everything.

Bullet #6. The Client Must Feel That Your Relationship Is Always Evolving

Look. The human brain is wired to constantly need something new. Simply because it runs on the difference in potential.

If I eat a delicious pastry once, twice — I enjoy it. The third time, it doesn't taste quite as good. I want something fresh.

When you first bring a member of your target audience into the Customer Journey, you need to keep constantly evolving your relationship right up to the first sale: always moving things to a new level, always introducing something new.

But most businesses stop introducing anything new into their relationship with the client after that first sale. And the client simply gets bored. There's a very real chance they'll leave for a competitor if they think there's something fresher and more interesting over there.

I'll say it again: that's just how our brains work. The brain rewards us with a dopamine hit for everything new. And when dopamine is gone — the brain starts to crave it. Like an addict without a fix.

That's why the Customer Journey doesn't end at the first sale. That's actually where it begins. After the first sale, your job is to constantly work on developing new products, new offers, and so on.

If your client feels not just comfortable with you but genuinely engaged, you'll be able to keep them much longer. And you'll earn significantly more from them.

Which is precisely what the product funnel is built for.

The world's greatest example of client retention is McDonald's.

As its founder Ray Kroc once put it: “We can innovate faster than others can copy.” And they really do — practically every two weeks there are new kids’ promotions, new products, new gifts, new offers!

As you can see, keeping a client around isn’t just about doing your job well. You also have to avoid being boring.

Bullet #7. Sharing Company Assets for Marketing Success

A story from the field.

A few years ago I worked with the director and owner of a children’s development center. She needed new clients but didn’t know where to find them. Online advertising wasn’t working.

We started with a target audience analysis.

Who is the ideal client? A woman, around 27, married, with a few kids. Deeply involved in her children’s upbringing and activities.

When parents are seriously invested in their children’s education and leisure, they don’t settle for just one class or activity. Usually there are several: a foreign language, music school, singing, dance, and a million other options.

I suggested forming a collaboration with various educational and sports children’s organizations. Parents typically take their kids to different classes and clubs — easily up to age 10. While they’re waiting for their child, you can hand them a brochure with offers from other organizations.

It’s hiding in plain sight.

The owner took the idea and ran with it. The result — enrollment above 100% capacity and growth into a whole network of centers. Sales went up for her and for her partners.

Investment in advertising? Just the cost of printing brochures.

The key here is to have a strong offer. And it's definitely not "5% off your first class."

Bullet #8. The Client Must Feel Valued, Significant, and Respected

There's a widely cited statistic on the reasons companies lose their clients. Its exact source is hard to pin down, but the pattern matches what I've seen.

Here it is:

1% of those who leave have simply passed away. Nothing a business can do about it. Just accept it.

3% move to a different location. Relevant for brick-and-mortar; not so much for online.

5% follow advice from friends and acquaintances and leave based on their recommendation to a competitor. This is something we can influence. Why didn't the business put in the effort to make the client bring their friends to us instead of leaving? That's a question worth answering — it'll help reduce churn and start attracting new clients through word of mouth.

10% choose a cheaper product or a better one. We can influence this churn too. There's no point in lowering prices, of course, but we can absolutely put in the work to better demonstrate the value and quality of our product.

14% are unhappy with the product or service. You can't please everyone, so some churn is inevitable — someone will always leave. But my personal experience as a customer shows that many companies lose me precisely because they know I'm unhappy — and they just don't care.

1+3+5+10+14 = 32% of losses.

So who are the other 68%?

These are people who feel indifference from the business and its staff. Buyers feel undervalued, insignificant. They feel like they're being taken for granted.

What do you do?

It's actually simple: you just need to be genuinely invested in solving the client's problems. Be interested in their life. Not just ship the product and take their money.

And this understanding needs to be shared by every single member of your team.

Even the junior cleaning lady at the store — mop in hand, wiping away the mud customers track in from outside.

Show genuine involvement, and you'll not only stop the churn — you'll start selling more, turning clients into brand advocates who bring you new customers.

It's very, very simple. But for some reason, almost nobody does it.

Bullet #9. Developing New Products for Existing Clients Is More Profitable Than Finding New Clients for What You Already Have

Let's think through this logically.

You have a product or service. It's great, but it's just the one. Any single client's consumption of that product or service has a natural ceiling.

You have natural churn of regular clients. And to just stay flat, you need to bring in new clients. Great if word of mouth is handling that. But what if it's not keeping up? Then you simply have to start generating new leads.

You need to set up ads, create a lead magnet to attract the right audience, pull people into your database, nurture them for a while. And then, eventually — a first sale, which might turn the buyer into a regular client. But that's not guaranteed.

Or you can do something simpler. Find out what else your clients need, and just give them that. They're already your clients — they don't need to be convinced of your product quality.

Bullet #10. Exceed Expectations

My favorite example — it perfectly illustrates this bullet.

Imagine there's a bakery on your way home where you buy bread every day.

You need bread, and you have a specific expectation: it should be fresh, tasty, and not go moldy by morning.

That's exactly what you get. You receive what you expect.

Scenario #1

You walk in, buy the bread, get home, slice it open — and find a couple of mouse tails inside.

This is called "exceeding expectations — in the negative direction." In this case, you'll tell everyone you know not to go to that bakery, and you'll never go back yourself. The bakery has lost a loyal customer and gained a brand anti-advocate who will troll them at every opportunity and tell every single person they know about what happened. The result: a wave of customer churn.

Scenario #2

You walk in, buy your bread — and they reach under the counter and hand you a beautiful craft bag filled with little pastries. Different fillings: cheese, apple, cinnamon, and more. They say: "A little gift from us. Try the pastries — it's our new line that's hitting the shelves soon. Come back tomorrow and tell us what you think."

You get home, try the pastries — and realize this is the best thing that has ever happened to your taste buds. An absolute celebration of flavor.

This is called “exceeding expectations — in the positive direction.” In this case, you’ll buy even more baked goods from them. And you’ll tell all your friends and family how amazing it is there and how everyone absolutely has to try their pastries.

Key point: they didn’t sell you those pastries. They gave them to you. The exchange happened above and beyond.

It’s exactly this above-and-beyond exchange that creates brand advocates and organic word-of-mouth.

This bullet is what allows you to build a legion of loyal clients who will enthusiastically give you glowing reviews and bring you several more legions of new customers.

There is one important nuance here: clients get used to good things quickly. So you’ll need to loop in Bullet #6 right away — the client must feel constant change.

But if you pull it off, this combo will help you build a McDonald’s-level business.

Bullet #11. Become a Champion

As they say in the military: a soldier who doesn’t dream of becoming a general isn’t worth much.

In business, it’s the same.

If you have no growth plan, no intention of becoming #1 in your niche, you will inevitably start losing ground. And sooner or later, you’ll hit the bottom. Because in business, as in life, there’s no such thing as standing still. You’re either growing or shrinking.

And here’s one more secret that isn’t really a secret. It’s better to dream big from the start. I don’t know why, but ambitious plans tend to be easier to pull off than “same as everyone else” plans. Probably because when you build a championship plan, you have far fewer competitors.

So don’t be afraid to dream at full throttle, and start planning your global takeover through your own business empire — today.

To sum it all up:

In everything you do, trust your common sense. Exceed client expectations, constantly develop your product line, and invent new offers. Build outstanding offers that are crystal clear to your specific target audience. Be bold — don’t be afraid — and sell your world-class product or service at every touchpoint.

Design your own strategy for building a business empire, and don’t be afraid to dream. Remember — dreams have a way of coming true.

Conclusion

Remember Sara the accountant who rejected the computer, and Joe the shop owner who clung to the Yellow Pages? Their businesses became museum pieces because they refused to change.

You didn't. You caught the third wave. Instead of fearing new tools, you decided to use them at full power. You no longer say: "I'm not a marketer." Now you have the WTF system: Without The Friction — marketing without resistance.

What did you learn in these pages?

First, how to instantly capture the attention of an information-overloaded audience and turn a moment of interest into a conversation.

Second, how to build genuine trust with clients through regular "touchpoints" — every day, without being annoying, by delivering value and care.

Third, how to create offers that are impossible to refuse — so compelling and well-crafted that it's easier for the client to say "yes" than to walk away.

And finally, you discovered how modern AI tools take the lion's share of the routine off your plate: generating ideas, copy, visuals, analytics — everything that used to require a whole team and mountains of time. No more unnecessary friction: just you, your business, and a clear path from a great idea to a happy client.

We've walked through strategies and tactics that have been tested in the real world. Now the ball is in your court. Knowledge on its own won't change anything — action will change everything.

The most successful entrepreneurs aren't smarter or stronger than everyone else — they simply act. They follow through. They adopt tools before their competitors do. They test, fail, improve, and keep moving forward.

Don't put it off until tomorrow, and especially not "someday." Right today, choose one small thing from this book and put it into practice. Send your first email newsletter. Conduct a client interview. Launch a test ad with a new offer. See what happens — and keep going. Step by step, you'll build up enough momentum that your competitors will be left far behind.

Of course, change is always a little scary. But let's remember the law of the three waves: it's not the biggest or the richest who wins — it's the most flexible and the fastest. The business world will never be the same — and that's good news. Small entrepreneurs now have the same opportunities as corporations, thanks to accessible AI and the accumulated knowledge at your fingertips.

You have no more excuses to stand still. Every tool, tactic, and technique in this book is designed to remove the barriers between you and your client. The only thing left is the most important thing — your resolve to see it through to the end.

Maybe after reading this book you felt a surge of confidence. Good. Marketing is no longer dark magic reserved for the chosen few. It's a clear set of skills and systems that are now in your hands. You've gone from skepticism to understanding, from randomly throwing money at ads to having a conscious strategy. You know how to attract attention and interest, how to build trust and bring a client all the way to a purchase, how to optimize every part of your funnel.

You've become your own marketer — more effective than any "hundred-thousand-dollar specialist," because you actually care.

Because this is your business and your dreams.

Everything you need for the leap is already in your hands. The decision is yours. For my part, I genuinely want every one of my readers to achieve the results they dream of. I sincerely hope that in a couple of months or a year, I'll hear your success story — the story of how you took these ideas and grew your business, how you turned knowledge into profit and freedom.

You're standing at the edge of new possibilities. Step over the doubt and move forward. Ride the wave of technology instead of fearing it — and it will carry you to new heights. Act boldly and persistently. Do more than you promise. Remember: every day of inaction is a lost client — one you could have won, but your competitor took instead.

Don't give them what's yours. Take your future into your own hands. Turn marketing from an expense and a headache into a source of energy and growth for your business.

Go and act. Bring your ideas to life. Keep your promises. Grow beyond who you were yesterday. Do what 90% of the lazy players in the market refuse to do. You already have the edge — the knowledge and the tool that those who haven't read this book don't have. All that's left is to turn that edge into results.

Forward — toward your ambitions! I believe in you and in your success. Let this book be just the beginning of your great journey. And now — stop reading. It's time to act without the brakes. Your success is in your hands — go take it!

P.S.: Where Did All This Information Come From

I want to be upfront with you right away. I'm not a marketing genius. I'm a practitioner with extensive hands-on experience and a constant drive to learn and apply new things.

Everything I've written here consists of tactics and strategies I've gathered from around the world, from the most advanced marketers on the planet. I've studied countless courses and materials. I diligently took notes. And I applied them in my own practice.

Some methods worked, but not as well as I'd hoped. Others delivered outstanding results.

My personal contribution is that I took the methodologies available on the market, refined them to my own taste and style, and combined them into my own method. Then came the era of AI, which became a catalyst and accelerator for getting results.

So — if something in my book seems familiar to you, that's perfectly normal. In the world of marketing, very little has actually changed over the past century and a half. Because all sales are built on buyer psychology. And that has remained virtually unchanged for thousands of years.
